THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1903.

v.

STEAMSHIP SOUTHWARK, Whereof the International Navigation Company is Owner, Resp't.†

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1-17.)

Carriers—Harter act—seaworthiness — due diligence—burden of proof—stipulation to relieve carrier from statutory duty.

1. The furnishing of a refrigerating apparatus in good order and repair, competent for the safe transportation of a cargo of dressed beef which a vessel has undertaken to carry, is within the obligation to use due diligence to provide a seaworthy vessel, imposed upon the owner by the Harter act (Feb. 13, 1893) as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the benefits of that act in limiting the owner's liability as provided therein.
2. The burden of proof which rests upon the shipowner to show the discharge of his initial duty under the Harter act to use due diligence to provide a refrigerating apparatus in good order and repair, competent for the safe transportation of a cargo of dressed beef which he has undertaken to carry, is not sustained by evidence of a superficial inspection shortly before sailing, which disclosed no defect, where the testimony also shows that the machinery broke down very shortly after leaving port, and after being repaired broke down again, and during the voyage did not reduce the temperature sufficiently to preserve the meat, and tends to show that the proper temperature had not been produced when the cargo was received, and that the break-down occurred in an attempt to reduce it to the proper degree.

3. Stipulations in a bill of lading cannot relieve a carrier from the discharge of his initial duty under the Harter act to use due diligence to furnish a seaworthy vessel.

ing a vessel from fault for the loss of a cargo of dressed beef. Reversed and remanded to the District Court, with instructions to enter a decree for libellants.

Statement by Mr. Justice Day:

This case originated in a libel in rem filed in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, to recover for the loss of a quantity of dressed beef, shipped by the libellants on the steamer Southwark, a vessel belonging to the respondent, the International Navigation Company. The meat was required to be kept chilled during the passage, and the ship was engaged in the business of carrying such freight and was fitted with a refrigerating apparatus for the purpose. The meat was received under a bill of lading acknowledging the receipt thereof in apparent good order and condition, and undertaking to deliver the same at Liverpool in like good order and condition. Across the bill of lading there was this printed stipulation: "It is expressly provided that the goods shipped hereunder are absolutely at the risk of the owners in every respect, and that the carrier is responsible for no loss, delay, or damage thereto, however arising, including stowage, and all risks of breakdown or injury, however caused, whether to its refrigerator or its machinery, even though arising from defect existing at or previous to the commencement of the voyage; also that, in case of the meat becoming, from any cause, in the opinion of the master of the vessel, putrid, dangerous or offensive to the passengers or the crew, it may be thrown overboard or otherwise disposed of without liability to the carrier for the consequent loss."

Upon the arrival of the ship at Liverpool, the meat was found to be in bad condition, mouldy and slimy, resulting in a considerable loss to the shipper. The libel seeks a recovery because the refrigerating apparatus was out of repair at the time of sailing, and was not repaired during the voyage, so that the temperature of the compartment in which the meat was carried could not be reduced to the proper degree for its safe transportation.

The answer avers that the Southwark left [3] Philadelphia with *the refrigerating apparatus in perfect order after due inspection, and all necessary repairs were duly and promptly made while on the voyage.

Upon hearing in the district court, a decree was entered exonerating the vessel from fault, which decree was affirmed in the circuit court of appeals. 104 Fed. 103, 48 C. C. A. 123, 108 Fed. 880.

Mr. John Frederick Lewis argued the cause, and, with Mr. H. L. Cheyney, filed a brief for petitioners:

In the absence of a special contract the warranty of the refrigerating machinery is identical with, and probably included in, the warranty of the seaworthiness of the ship itself.

The Maori King v. Hughes, 8 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 65 [1895] 2 Q. B. 550; The Prussia, 35 C. C. A. 625, 93 Fed. 837.

The test of seaworthiness is whether the vessel is reasonably fit to carry the cargo which she has undertaken to transport.

The Silvia, 171 U. S. 402, 43 L. ed. 241, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7.

Whether the warranty of seaworthiness covers the refrigerating machinery is unimportant, as it must be admitted that, in the absence of a special contract, the warranty in both cases is the same, and covers even latent defects.

The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 39 L. ed. 644, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537; The Maori King v. Hughes [1895] 2 Q. B. 550; The Prussia, 35 C. C. A. 625, 93 Fed. 837.

Exceptions in a bill of lading ought, if in reason it be possible to do so, to receive a construction not nullifying and destroying the implied obligation of the shipowner to provide a ship proper for the performance of the duty which he has undertaken.

The Carib Prince, 170 U. S. 659, 42 L. ed. 1186, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 753.

The burden is upon the shipowner to show that he has used the required degree of diligence.

International Nav. Co. v. Farr & B. Mfg. Co. 181 U. S. 218, 45 L. ed. 830, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591.

The Harter act applies to bills of lading issued for fresh meat.

The Prussia, 35 C. C. A. 625, 93 Fed. 837.

There is a warranty of the initial fitness of the vessel in all respects to carry the cargo received.

Queensland Nat. Bank v. Peninsular & Oriental Steam Nav. Co. [1898] 1 Q. B. 567; Tattersall v. National S. S. Co. L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 297.

A mere observation of a machine in motion is not an inspection, and does not relieve the carrier from liability.

The Aggi, 93 Fed. 484; The Phœnicia, 90 Fed. 116.

Where a vessel soon after leaving port becomes leaky without stress of weather or adequate cause of injury, the presumption is that she was unseaworthy before sailing.

Ceballos v. The Warren Adams, 20 C. C. A. 486, 38 U. S. App. 356, 74 Fed. 413; 163 U. S. 679, 41 L. ed. 316, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep.

1199; Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Bancroft-Whitney Co. 94 Fed. 196.

The Harter act does not relieve the warranty of initial seaworthiness which the law imposes upon the shipowner; and that act merely permits the shipowner to contract against the obligation of seaworthiness, and substitute therefor the duty of due diligence.

A shipowner is chargeable with any negligence of his agents appointed to inspect a steamer to exercise the due diligence required by the Harter act.

Switzerland Marine Ins. Co. v. The Flamborough, 69 Fed. 470.

Where the bill of lading acknowledges the receipt of the cargo in apparent good order and condition, and requires its delivery in like good order and condition, this stipulation places an obligation on the shipowner to provide a ship fit to carry the cargo to its destination.

The Maori King v. Hughes, 8 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 67.

Where an account of circumstances leading to a loss is entirely within the control of one side of the controversy, there is more burden upon such party than where the matter has been open to the other side for an ascertainment of the facts.

The Manitou, 116 Fed. 61.

Where cargo is injured after it is received on board a vessel and before its delivery, the burden of proof rests upon the carrier to show that the vessel was in all respects seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage before it can even invoke the provisions of the Harter act.

The C. W. Elphicke, 117 Fed. 279.

Mr. N. Dubois Miller argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Howard H. Yocum and J. Rodman Paul and Messrs. Biddle & Ward, filed a brief for respondent:

The concurrent findings of two lower courts on questions of fact will not be disturbed.

The Prussia, 35 C. C. A. 625, 93 Fed. 837.

A deed, a will, or other instrument can in part be good, although another part is void because in contravention of positive law.

Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561.

The same rule has been applied even to statutes which were in part unconstitutional.

Mr. Justice Day, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

Before the passage of the act of Congress of February 13, 1893 (27 Stat. at L. 445, chap. 105, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2946), known as the Harter act, it was the settled law of this court that, in the absence of special contract, there was a warranty upon the part of the shipowner that the ship was seaworthy at the beginning of her voyage. The warranty was absolute, and did not depend upon the knowledge of the owner, or the diligence of his efforts to provide a seaworthy vessel. The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 39 L. ed. 644, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537; The Edwin I. Morrison, 153 U. S. 199, 38 L. ed. 688, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 823; The Irrawaddy, 171 U. S. 187, sub nom. Flint v. Christall, 43 L. ed. 130, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831.

After its passage, this act became the rule of law for cases coming within its terms. In § 2 it is expressly provided that it shall be unlawful for any vessel transporting property or merchandise from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to insert in any bills of lading or shipping documents any covenant or agreement whereby the obligation of the owner to use due diligence to properly equip, man, provision, and outfit said vessel, and to make the vessel seaworthy and capable of performing her intended voyage, shall in anywise be lessened, weakened, or avoided. In this connection, Mr. Justice Brown, in speaking of the nature and origin of this law, in the case of The Delaware, 161 U. S. 471, 40 L. ed. 776, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 516, used this language: "The act was the outgrowth of *attempts made in recent years to limit, as far as possible, the liability of the vessel and her owners, by inserting in bills of lading stipulations against losses arising from unseaworthiness, bad stowage, and negligence in navigation, and other forms of liability, which had been held by the courts of England, if not of this country, to be valid as contracts, and to be respected even when they exempted the ship from the consequences of her own negligence. As decisions were made by the courts from time to time, holding the vessel for nonexcepted liabilities, new clauses were inserted in the bills of lading to meet these decisions, until the common-law responsibility of carriers by sea had been frittered away to such an extent that several of the leading commercial associations, both in this country and in England, had taken the subject in hand, and suggested amendments to the maritime law in line with those embodied in the Harter act." This language, no doubt, had reference to the prohibitive provisions of § 2 of the act.

Section 3 must be read with § 2 to effectuate the purpose of the act, and shows an intention upon the part of Congress to relax, in certain respects, the harshness of the previous rules of obligation upon shipowners, provided the owner shall exercise due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy in all respects, in which event neither the vessel nor the owner shall be liable, among other things, for faults of management or from loss from inherent defect, quality, or vice of the thing carried. Of this feature of the law it was said by Mr. Justice Shiras, delivering the opinion of the court in the case of The Irrawaddy, 171 U. S. 192, 193, sub nom. Flint v. Christall, 43 L. ed. 132, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833: "Plainly, the main purposes of the act were to relieve the shipowner from liability for latent defects not discoverable by the utmost care and diligence, and, in event that he has exercised due diligence to make his vessel seaworthy, to exempt him and the ship from responsibility for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the vessel. . . . Although the foundation of the rule that *forbade shipowners to contract for exemption from liability for negligence in their agents and employees was in the decisions of the courts that such contracts were against public policy, it was, nevertheless, competent for Congress to make a change in the standard of duty, and it is plainly the duty of courts to conform in their decisions to the policy so declared."

[8] The effect of this law is not to relieve the owner from the general duty of furnishing a seaworthy ship, but to limit his liability in certain particulars and upon the condition named in the statute. The Carib Prince, 170 U. S. 655, 42 L. ed. 1181, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 753. Before the passage of the act, the initial obligation could be limited in certain particulars by special contract not involving negligence of the owner. Since the passage of the act, as to cases coming within its terms, before the owner can have the benefit of the relief provided by § 3 he must have exercised due diligence to provide a seaworthy vessel, capable of performing her intended voyage. Obviously, a cargo of dressed beef to be shipped a long distance is one which, from the inherent quality of the thing carried, is liable to loss unless properly stowed in rooms artificially chilled for the purpose of preserving it.

We proceed to inquire whether the furnishing of a refrigerating apparatus in good order and repair, competent for the purpose required, was within the obligation imposed by the Harter act as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the benefits of the act in limiting the owner's liability as provided therein.

Bouvier's Law Dictionary, vol. 2, p. 506, defines "seaworthiness" to be: "In maritime law, the sufficiency of the vessel in materials, construction, equipment, officers, men, and outfit for the trade or service in which it is employed." And the same author further says: "It can never be settled by positive rules of law how far this obligation of seaworthiness extends in any particular case, for the reason that improvements and changes in the means and modes of navigation frequently require new implements or new forms of old ones; and these, though not *necessary at first, become so [9] when there is an established usage that all ships of a certain quality, or those to be sent on certain voyages or used for certain purposes, shall have them." In the case of The Sylvia, 171 U. S. 462, 43 L. ed. 241, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, Mr. Justice Gray said: "The test of seaworthiness is whether the vessel is reasonably fit to carry the cargo which she has undertaken to transport." This is the commonly accepted definition of seaworthiness. As seaworthiness depends not only upon the vessel being staunch and fit to meet the perils of the sea, but upon its character in reference to the particular cargo to be transported, it follows that a vessel must be able to transport the cargo which it is held out as fit to carry, or it is not seaworthy in that respect. But for the special appliances furnished by the vessel, perishable cargoes, such as dressed beef, could not be shipped on long voyages in hot weather.

The trade of shipping dressed beef abroad has grown constantly in volume until it has become a most important part of our foreign commerce. For the purpose of properly discharging the duties involved in such transportation, vessels provided with refrigerating apparatus have been put into service, and compete with others for this branch of the carrying trade. The owners of such vessels hold them out to shippers and invite their trade upon the representation, actual or implied, that the apparatus provided is fit to receive and carry the meat in proper condition to its destination. For this service freight charges are doubtless made commensurate with the advantage furnished. The shipper has no control over the apparatus. It is under the supervision and care of the vessel owner, inspected and operated by those in his employ. This view is sustained by the English as well as by the American authorities. Maclellan on the Law of Merchant Shipping, 410, quotes from Stanton v. Richardson, L. R. 7 C. P. 421, Brett, J.: "It seems to me that the obligation of the shipowner is to supply a ship that is seaworthy in relation to the cargo which he has undertaken to carry. I do not think, however, that this proposition [10] completely *expresses his liability, though the proposition I am about to state with regard to such liability in many cases may amount to the same thing only in effect. I think the obligation of the shipowner is to supply a ship reasonably fit to carry the cargo stipulated for in the charter party."

In Lyon v. Mells, 5 East, 428, Lord Ellenborough said: "In every contract for the carriage of goods between a person holding himself forth as the owner of a lighter or vessel ready to carry goods for hire and the person putting goods on board, or employing his vessel or lighter for that purpose, it is a term of the contract on the part of the carrier or lighterman, implied by law, that his vessel is tight and fit for the purpose or employment for which he offers and holds it forth to the public; it is the very foundation and immediate substratum of the contract that it is so; the law presumes a promise to that effect on the part of the carrier without any actual proof; and every reason of sound policy and public convenience requires it should be so."

In Rowson v. Atlantic Transp. Co. [1903] 1 K. B. 114, butter was shipped on defendant's ship, New York to London. The bill of lading provided that it should be subject to all the terms and provisions of, and all the exemptions from liability contained in, the Harter act. The butter, which was sound when shipped in New York, was delivered in London in a damaged condition. It was carried in certain insulated chambers, connected with the refrigerating apparatus with which the ship was supplied for the purpose of enabling her to carry perishable goods during the summer months. At the time of the shipment these chambers were cooled down to a proper temperature for the reception of the butter, and the refrigerating machinery was in good working order. The damage to the butter was caused by the negligence of the crew in the management of the refrigerating apparatus during the voyage, whereby the chambers were not kept at a sufficiently low temperature. It was contended by defendants that the negligence in the management of the refrigerating *appa- [11] ratus was not a fault or error of management within the Harter act. Kennedy, J., says: "That act gives protection only upon condition of the ship being seaworthy. Now, a vessel which has to carry cargo which can only be safely carried if its refrigerating machinery is in proper order is one which, at the present day, according to a series of decisions, both in this country and in America, cannot properly be regarded as seaworthy unless it has that machinery in proper order. The term 'seaworthiness' is one which was originally, no doubt, used in days when refrigerating apparatus and other modern appliances for the safe carriage of cargo were unknown. In a sense it is obviously not a happy term to use, except with regard to that condition of the vessel which enables the owner to avoid exposure of the cargo to the perils of the sea. But the more extended use of the term has come to be well recognized. In the American case of The Thames, in the course of the judgment of the court, it is said: 'A ship may be seaworthy as to one sort of cargo and unseaworthy as to another. When a customary and well-known article of commerce is received on board ship and carried on a voyage, the master guarantees the seaworthiness of his ship for taking charge of that article. As to her cargo, seaworthiness is that quality of a ship which fits it for carrying safely the particular merchandise which it takes on board. A ship is impliedly warranted to be seaworthy quoad that article, and if damage occurs in consequence of the unfitness of the ship for carrying that article, the ship is liable, and cannot exonerate itself by proving the non sequitur that it is capable of carrying safely and without damage some other article of a different character.'"

In The Maori King v. Hughes [1895] 2 Q. B. 550, it was held that a vessel offering to carry frozen meat impliedly warranted that the refrigerating machinery was, at the time of shipment, fit to carry such cargo in safety.

The case of The Thames, from which Judge Kennedy quotes, is reported in 10 C. C. A. 232, 8 U. S. App. 580, 61 Fed. 1014, and *was [12] decided by the circuit court of appeals for the fourth circuit. In that case, it was held that the vessel in question was not seaworthy in respect to a cargo of flour which it had undertaken to transport.

The further question arises in case of loss, Upon whom rests the burden of proof as to the discharge of this initial duty by the shipowner? This question was before the court in the case of International Nav. Co. v. Farr & B. Mfg. Co. 181 U. S. 218, 45 L. ed. 830, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591, in which the provisions of the Harter act were under consideration. In the course of the opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said: "We repeat, that even if the loss occur through fault or error in management, the exemption cannot be availed of unless the vessel was seaworthy when she sailed, or due diligence to make her so had been exercised, and it is for the owner to establish the existence of one or the other of these conditions."

In the district court, which judgment was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, it was held that the burden of proof, in view of the stipulation of the bill of lading in this case, was not upon the carrier, but upon the shipper, and that there could only be a recovery in the event that the shipper had shown, by satisfactory evidence, negligence upon the part of the carrier. This case was decided before the opinion was delivered in the case of International Nav. Co. v. Farr & B. Mfg. Co. 181 U. S. 218, 45 L. ed. 830, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591, and upon this point is in direct opposition thereto, and fails to give proper weight to the provisions of the act making it incumbent upon the carrier to use due diligence to provide a seaworthy vessel.

It is urged that the findings in both the district court and the circuit court of appeals, that the loss did not arise from want of proper refrigerating apparatus, but was due to a break-down in the machinery after the voyage was begun, are findings of fact in the courts below which should be held conclusive here. There are observations in the opinions of the learned judges consistent with the view that it was found that *the loss was due to a break-down in the machinery after the voyage had begun, and ordinarily such findings as to matters of fact are followed in this court; but the case below was tried upon a theory which ignored the initial duty of the carrier to use due diligence to provide a seaworthy vessel, properly equipped for the purpose intended. The bill of lading was treated as a special contract, throwing upon the shipper, if he would recover, the burden of establishing negligence upon the part of the carrier. As we have before stated, the right of the carrier to be exonerated in the respects named in the Harter act depends upon the exercise of due diligence upon his part in discharging the primary duty of providing a seaworthy vessel. The burden of proof being upon the carrier to show that he has exercised due diligence to provide a seaworthy vessel at the time he received the meat and started upon the voyage, the question arises, Was this duty discharged? "This due diligence required," said the Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion in International Nav. Co. v. Farr & B. Mfg. Co. 181 U. S. 218, 45 L. ed. 830, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591, "diligence to make the ship in all respects seaworthy; and that, in our judgment, means due diligence on the part of all the owners' servants in the use of the equipment before the commencement of the voyage and until it is actually commenced." An examination of the record convinces us that the respondent did not show by the weight of the testimony that this initial duty had been discharged. The testimony discloses an inspection upon the part of the carrier shortly before the sailing of the vessel, in which, by superficial observation, no defect in the refrigerating apparatus was discovered, but the testimony also shows that but a short time after the sailing of the ship, within one to three hours, the apparatus broke down and was repaired and then broke down again, and during the voyage to Liverpool did not reduce the temperature of the storage room sufficiently to preserve the meat, which was found to be in a very bad condition upon the opening of the refrigerating box at Liverpool. This sudden break-down when the *vessel was scarcely out of port would raise [14] the presumption of unseaworthiness at the time of the sailing, making it incumbent upon the vessel owner to prove seaworthiness, and this independently of the provisions of the Harter act. Work v. Leathers, 97 U. S. 379, 24 L. ed. 1012.

The practice existed, upon the part of vessel owners, of taking the temperature of the brine, which was the carrying medium for cooling the storage room, and also of the room itself, and keeping a record thereof. This record, so far as kept, is produced at the instance of the libellant, and it does not disclose that at any time the temperature was sufficiently low to preserve the meat. The machinery for reducing the temperature had been in operation forty-eight hours or more in advance of receiving the meat. The record of the temperature does not seem to have been kept after the machinery for reducing temperature was put into operation up to the time of the sailing of the ship, and that part of the log in evidence tends strongly to show that both before and after the inspection was made the temperature of the commercial box in which the meat was stored was never properly reduced. The refrigerating apparatus in use upon the Southwark was of the compression type, using ammonia gas as a refrigerating agent and brine as the circulating medium. The apparatus provided for the compression of the ammonia gas, in which form it was carried to a high degree of heat. It is then carried into pipes and condensed by means of cooling water passed over the pipes, reducing the gas to a liquid form. The liquid is then carried through a series of coils or pipes, where, being suddenly relieved of pressure, it expands into a gaseous form, absorbing heat from the surrounding objects, and cooling the pipes or coils and brine with which the pipes are brought into contact. This brine being circulated in the pipes, about the commercial room provided for the reception of the meat, reduces the compartment to a proper degree of temperature for the reception and preservation of the cargo. Whether the room is fit to receive the meat [15] may be tested by the simple process of *placing a thermometer therein, taking its temperature. Before the meat is taken, this temperature should be brought down to from 25 to 30 degrees, and should be maintained at a low degree in order to preserve the meat.

In the present case while the inspector did not take the temperature of this room, the depositions of the engineer and the assistant, or refrigerating engineer, were taken abroad, and it appears that the temperature of the room was taken frequently during the seventy-two hours in which these witnesses say the apparatus was being worked before the meat was received. There is no sufficient reason given why a record of these temperatures was not made. The refrigerating engineer says that it was not customary, that there were no orders to that effect, and there was no room in the log for such a record, although it appears a record was kept after the vessel sailed, and from that time throughout the voyage, of the averages of the temperature of the room. In a vague way these men say the room was cooling down all right. It would have been a very easy matter to have established this fact by keeping a record of such observations, which would have shown conclusively the temperature of the commercial room. A careful perusal of the testimony tends strongly to the inference that the commercial room was not of a proper temperature, and that the machinery broke down almost before leaving port in an attempt to reduce it to a proper degree. There is some testimony tending to show that the water in the port at Philadelphia, used to cool the pipes, at the time was so warm as to render it difficult to bring down the temperature of the room, but the weight of the testimony is that these refrigerating machines are intended to work and do work in warmer latitudes and in a higher degree of temperature than was shown to have existed at the time in question.

But whether fault can be affirmatively established in this respect, it is not necessary to determine. The burden was upon the owner to show, by making proper and reasonable tests, that the vessel was seaworthy and in a fit condition to receive and *trans- [16] port the cargo undertaken to be carried; and if, by the failure to adopt such tests and to furnish such proofs, the question of the ship's efficiency is left in doubt, that doubt must be resolved against the shipowner, and in favor of the shipper. In other words, the vessel owner has not sustained the burden cast upon him to establish the fact that he has used due diligence to furnish a seaworthy vessel, and, between him and the shipper, must bear the loss. The Edwin I. Morrison, 153 U. S. 199-215, 38 L. ed. 688-694, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 823; The Phœnicia, 90 Fed. 117.

It is true the inspector said that he discovered no leak of ammonia gas such as was afterward discovered, but he seems to have relied upon external appearances and the lack of evidences of the leaking of the gas rather than upon proper tests of the apparatus and its actual workings. We perceive no reason why such tests should not have been made. We think it was the duty of the carrier to cause them to be applied and determine the working condition of the apparatus before receiving the cargo, which in hot weather and upon a long voyage would surely spoil unless a proper condition of refrigeration was established. The Harter act, as we understand it, relieves carriers from some of the harsher rules of obligation in force before its passage, but this relief is conditioned upon the discharge of the carrier's duty to use due diligence to provide that which it holds out to the shipper it is competent to furnish,—a seaworthy vessel, duly equipped and provided for the purposes of the voyage. This rule, in our judgment, should not be relaxed by judicial interpretation or construction, and in this case we think the burden imposed by the law upon the carrier, of making due proof of the discharge of its duty in this respect, was not sustained, and there was error in the courts below in holding otherwise.

It is argued that appellees are not claiming the benefit of the Harter act, but rely upon the contract in the bill of lading to exempt them from liability in the absence of affirmative proof of negligence.

To permit the stipulations of this bill of lading to cut down *the statutory require- [17] ments of § 2 of the Harter act would be to allow the parties to enforce a contract in violation of the positive terms of the statute. As was said by Mr. Justice White, of somewhat similar provisions in the contract before the court in The Kensington, 183 U. S. 263, 46 L. ed. 190, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 102: "It is apparent that they were void, since they unequivocally sought to relieve the carrier from the initial duty of furnishing a seaworthy vessel, for all neglect in loading or stowing, and, indeed, for any and every fault of commission or omission on the part of the carrier or its servants."

We think, for the reasons stated, there was error in rendering a decree dismissing the libel, and the decree of the District Court, as well as the judgment of affirmance of the Court of Appeals, will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the District Court, with instructions to enter a decree in favor of the libellants.

3. Proceedings in rem to enforce a lien for repairs furnished to a vessel which was at the time engaged in navigating the Erie canal are no less within the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts because such repairs were made in dry dock.
4. The exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts extends to the enforcement by proceedings in rem of a lien for repairs furnished to a vessel engaged in navigating the Erie canal, although such vessel was employed wholly in commerce between ports in the same state.
5. An unconstitutional infringement upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts over admiralty and maritime cases is made by N. Y. Laws 1897, chap. 418, §§ 30, 35, so far as such statute is construed by the courts of that state to provide for the enforcement in a state court by proceedings in rem of a lien for repairs made in dry dock to a canal boat engaged in navigating the Erie canal and Hudson river.

Argued March 11, 12, 1903. Decided October 26, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York to review a judgment enforcing a lien for repairs furnished to a canal boat, entered pursuant to the affirm-from such water way, may leave it, is not a navigable water of the United States. Manigault v. Ward, 123 Fed. 707.

The mere capacity to pass in a boat of any size, however small, from one stream or rivulet to another is not sufficient to constitute a navigable water of the United States which the act of Congress of September 19, 1890, makes it a misdemeanor to obstruct, where such channel is not substantially useful to some purpose of interstate commerce. Leovy v. United States, 177 U. S. 621, 44 L. ed. 914, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797. Hence, a pass or crevasse caused by the overflow of the Mississippi river, making a channel to the Gulf of Mexico, through which a few fishermen have occasionally gone with small vessels carrying oysters for planting, and through which one or two cargoes of willows and timber may have passed, but which has not been used for any purpose of interstate commerce, and the gulf end of which has become closed, does not constitute a navigable water of the United States in such a sense that a dam erected therein for the purpose and with the effect of reclaiming overflowed lands will constitute an obstruction within the prohibition of the act of September 19, 1890, against obstructions in navigable waters without authority of the Secretary of War. Ibid.

For the purpose of founding admiralty jurisdiction a canal may be held to be navigable water of the United States if it comes within the approved definition of such water. Ex parte Boyer, 109 U. S. 629, 27 L. ed. 1056, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434.

ance of a final order of that court by the Appellate Division and the Court of Appeals. Reversed.

See same case below, in Appellate Division of Supreme Court, 57 App. Div. 636, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1139, in Court of Appeals, 168 N. Y. 586, 60 N. E. 1112.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

[18] *This was a writ of error to review a judgment of the supreme court of the state of New York sustaining the jurisdiction of that court to enforce a lien for repairs made by Haines to the canal boat Robert W. Parsons, which was engaged at the time in navigating the Erie canal and Hudson river.

Defense, that the statute of the state of New York, giving a lien for such repairs, and providing a remedy for enforcing the same in rem, is unconstitutional, so far as concerns the remedy, and an infringement upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in admiralty and maritime causes.

A motion to vacate the attachment, issued upon the petition of Haines, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, was denied, an appeal taken to the appellate division of the supreme court, where the case was argued, and the order of the court below affirmed by a majority of the justices. Re Haines, 52 App. Div. 550, 65 N. Y. Supp. 350. From the final order of the court, subsequently entered, the owner, Clara Perry, again appealed to the appellate division, where the order was affirmed (Re Haines, 57 App. Div. 636, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1139), and again by the court of appeals. Re Haines, 168 N. Y. 586, 60 N. E. 1112. Whereupon a writ of error was sued out from this court.

Mr. Martin Clark argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

This case raises the question of the construction and constitutionality of the statutes of the state of New York, giving a lien for repairs upon vessels, and providing for the enforcement of such lien by proceedings [24] in rem. The statute conferring *the lien, so far as it is material, is given in the margin.† It will be noticed that it expressly excludes liens founded upon maritime contracts.

That a state may provide for liens in favor of material men for necessities furnished to a vessel in her home port, or in a port of the state to which she belongs, though the contract to furnish the same is a maritime contract, and that such liens can be enforced by proceedings in rem in the district courts of the United States, is so well settled by a series of cases in this court as to be no longer open to question. The General Smith, 4 Wheat. 438, 4 L. ed. 609; The Planter (Peyroux v. Howard), 7 Pet. 324, 8 L. ed. 700; The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, 522, sub nom. Meyer v. Tupper, 17 L. ed. 180. The remedy thus administered by the admiralty court is exclusive. The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411, 18 L. ed. 397; The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 555, 18 L. ed. 451; The Belfast, 7 Wall. 624, 19 L. ed. 266; The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 559, sub nom. Rodd v. Heartt, 22 L. ed. 654; Johnson v. Chicago & P. Elevator Co. 119 U. S. 388, 397, 30 L. ed. 447, 450, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254; The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1, 12, 37 L. ed. 345, 347, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 498; Bird v. The Josephine, 39 N. Y. 19; Brookman v. Hamill, 43 N. Y. 554, 3 Am. Rep. 731; Poole v. Kermit, 59 N. Y. 554. If there were any doubts regarding this question, they were completely put to rest by the case of The Glide, 167 U. S. 606, 42 L. ed. 296, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 930, in which it was distinctly held, in an exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Gray, that the enforcement in rem of a lien upon a vessel for *repairs and supplies furnished in [25] her home port was exclusively within the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

It is equally well established that, for causes of action not cognizable in admiralty, either in rem or in personam, the states may not only grant liens, but may provide remedies for their enforcement. Contracts for the building of a ship are the most prominent examples of such as are not maritime in their character, and hence within this rule. People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. 393, 15 L. ed. 961; Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. 129, 16 L. ed. 294; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. 532, 22 L. ed. 487; Johnson v. Chicago & P. Elevator Co. 119 U. S. 388, 30 L. ed. 447, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254; Sheppard v. Steele, 43 N. Y. 52, 3 Am. Rep. 660.

It remains to consider whether the contract in this case, which was for repairs furnished to a canal boat in a port of the †Laws of New York (1897), chap. 418.

"Sec. 30. A debt which is not a lien by the maritime law, and which amounts to $50 or upwards, on a seagoing or ocean-bound vessel, or $15 or upwards on any other vessel, shall be a lien on such vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and shall be preferred to all other liens thereon, except mariner's wages, if such debt is contracted by the master, owner, charterer, builder, or consignee of such ship or vessel, or by the agent of either of them, within this state, for either of the following purposes:

"1. For work done or material or other articles furnished in this state for, or towards, the building, repairing, fitting, furnishing, or equipping of such vessel."

(The other subdivisions are immaterial.)

"Sec. 35. If a lien, created by virtue of this article, is founded upon a maritime contract, it can be enforced only by proceedings in the courts of the United States, and in any other case, in the courts of this state, in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure."

state to which she belonged, was a maritime contract. If it were, the position of the state courts was wrong. The denial of exclusive jurisdiction on the part of the admiralty court to enforce this lien must rest upon one of two propositions: Either because the cause of action arose upon an artificial canal, or because a canal boat is not a ship or vessel contemplated by the maritime law, and within the jurisdiction of the admiralty court.

1. At an early day, and following English precedents, it was held by this court in The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. 428, 6 L. ed. 358, that the admiralty courts could not rightfully exercise jurisdiction, "except in cases where the service was substantially performed, or to be performed, upon the sea, or upon waters within the ebb and flow of the tide." The opinion is a brief one by Mr. Justice Story, and contains little more than the announcement of the general principle, and with no attempt to distinguish the English cases. It lacks wholly any display of the abundant learning which, ten years before, had characterized his celebrated opinion in De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gall. 398, Fed. Cas. No. 3,776. The case was a strong one for the adoption of English precedents, as it concerned a voyage from a port in Kentucky up the Missouri river and back again to [26]*the same port. It was, however, flatly overruled in The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. 443, 13 L. ed. 1058, and the modern doctrine established, to which this court has consistently and invariably adhered, that not the ebb and flow of the tide, but the actual navigability of the waters, is the test of jurisdiction. It is true, that case arose upon the Great Lakes, but the rule was subsequently extended to cases arising upon the rivers above the tidal effect. Fretz v. Bull, 12 How. 466, 13 L. ed. 1068; The Magnolia, 20 How. 296, 15 L. ed. 909. In The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999, it was held that Grand river, a navigable water wholly within the state of Michigan, being a stream capable of bearing, for a distance of 40 miles, a steamer of 123 tons burden, and forming, by its junction with Lake Michigan, a continuous highway for commerce, both with other states and with foreign countries, was a navigable water of the United States; and the rule was broadly announced that "those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law, which are navigable in fact," and that "they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the states, when they form, in their ordinary condition by themselves, or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is, or may be, carried on with other states or foreign countries, in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water." The same principle was applied in The Montello, 20 Wall. 430, 22 L. ed. 391, to the Fox river in Wisconsin, although its navigability was interrupted by rapids and falls over which portages were required to be made, and to Chicago river in Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678, 27 L. ed. 442, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 185. See also Miller v. New York, 109 U. S. 385, 27 L. ed. 971, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228; Re Garnett, 141 U. S. 8, 35 L. ed. 632, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 840.

The only distinction between canals and other navigable waters is that they are rendered navigable by artificial means, and sometimes, though by no means always, are wholly within the limits of a particular state. We fail to see, however, that this creates any distinction in principle. They are usually constructed to connect waters navigable by nature, and to *avoid the port-[27] age of property from one navigable lake or river to another, or to improve or deepen a natural channel; and they are usually navigated by the same vessels which ply between the naturally navigable waters at either end of the canal. Examples of these are the St. Clair ship canal, connecting St. Clair river with the lake of the same name; the St. Mary's canal, connecting the waters of Lake Superior with those of Lake Huron; the Illinois & Michigan canal, connecting the waters of Lake Michigan with the Mississippi river; the Welland canal, between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie; the Suez canal, between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea; the Great North Holland canal, connecting Amsterdam directly with the German ocean; and the Erie canal, connecting Lake Erie with the Hudson river. Indeed, most of the harbors upon the lakes and Atlantic coast are made accessible by canals wholly artificial, or by an artificial channel broadening and deepening their natural approaches. Can it be possible that a cause of action which would be maritime, if occurring upon those connected waters, would cease to be maritime if arising upon the connecting waters? Must a collision which would give rise to a suit in admiralty, if occurring upon Lake Ontario, or Lake Erie, be prosecuted at common law, if happening upon the Welland canal? This question arose in this country in the case of The Avon, Brown, Adm. 170, Fed. Cas. No. 680, in which Judge Emmons, in a carefully considered opinion, took jurisdiction of a collision upon that canal, although it was wholly within British territory. While this was, with one exception (Scott v. The Young America, Newberry, Adm. 101, Fed. Cas. No. 12,549), the earliest case in this country, it was no novelty in England, since, in The Diana, Lush. 539, Dr. Lushington assumed jurisdiction of a collision between two British vessels in the Great North Holland canal, rejecting altogether the contention that the legislature did not intend to give the court jurisdiction over matters occurring in foreign territorial waters. This jurisdiction has since been declared in England to extend to collisions between foreign vessels in the Bosphorus (The Mali Ivo, L. R. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 356), and in the Scheldt (The Halley, L. R. 2 P. C. 193). See also The Thomas Carroll, 23 Fed. 912; The Oler, 2 Hughes, 12, Fed. Cas. No. 10,485; The E. M. McChesney, 8 Ben. 150, Fed. Cas. No. 4,463, 15 Blatchf. 183, Fed. Cas. No. 4,464; Malony v. The City of Milwaukee, 1 Fed. 611; The General Cass, Brown, Adm. 334, Fed. Cas. No. 5,307. The tidal test was long since abolished by statute in England. 24 Viet. chap. 10; Marsden, Collisions, 210.

Finally, in Ex parte Boyer, 109 U. S. 629, 27 L. ed. 1056, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434, such jurisdiction was held by this court to extend to collisions between two canal boats occurring in the Illinois & Lake Michigan canal, Mr. Justice Blatchford observing that "navigable water situated as this canal is, used for the purposes for which it is used,—a highway for commerce between ports and places in different states, carried on by vessels such as those in question here,—is public water of the United States, and within the legitimate scope of the admiralty jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution and statutes of the United States, even though the canal is wholly artificial, and is wholly within the body of a state, and subject to its ownership and control." The case is the more noteworthy from the fact that the canal was but 60 feet wide and 6 feet deep. It has never been overruled or questioned, and must be treated as settling the jurisdiction of the admiralty court over the waters of any artificial canal which is the means of communication between ports and places in different states and territories. It is not intended here to intimate that, if the waters, though navigable, are wholly territorial and used only for local traffic,—such, for instance, as the interior lakes of the state of New York,—they are to be considered as navigable waters of the United States. The Montello, 11 Wall. 411, 20 L. ed. 191. In the case under consideration, however, the Erie canal, though wholly within the state of New York, is a great highway of commerce between ports in different states and foreign countries, and is navigated by vessels which also traverse the waters of Hudson river from the head of navigation to its mouth.

2. But the crucial question involved in this case is, whether *the exclusive admiralty[29] and maritime jurisdiction of the Federal courts attaches to canal-boats,—in other words, whether they are ships or vessels within the meaning of the admiralty law. If it be once conceded, as, for the reasons above given, we think it must be, that navigable canals used as highways for interstate or foreign commerce are navigable waters of the United States, it would be an anomaly to hold that such jurisdiction did not attach to the only craft used in navigating such canals. It is true that, in the more modern constructions, these canals are made wide and deep enough for the largest vessels; but it so happens that the Erie canal was built at an early day, and was adapted only for vessels of light draught and peculiar construction. The possibilities of the future were then scarcely foreseen, and, even if they had been, the state was too poor to provide for anything beyond the immediate present. For those purposes the canal was amply sufficient, and for twenty years was the principal means of communication with the northwest, and was not only the highway over which all the merchandise was carried between the Hudson river and the Great Lakes, but was largely used for the transportation of passengers in the great western immigration which immediately followed its construction. As late as 1850, large and handsomely equipped passenger vessels were run every day at stated hours, and the canal continued to be, even after the building of the railways, a favorite method of communication with the Great Lakes. While these boats were vessels of light draught, and were drawn by animal power, they were from 150 to 300 tons' capacity,—larger than those out of which arose the maritime law of modern Europe, and much larger than those employed by Columbus and the earlier navigators in their discovery of the new world. It is said by a writer in the Quarterly Review (Benedict, Adm. Pr. § 220), that "the first discoverers of America committed themselves to the unknown ocean in barks, one not above 15 tons; Frobisher, in two vessels of 20 or 25 tons; Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in one of 10 tons only." The ships in *which the Vikings of Scandinavia invaded[30] England, and ravaged the coasts of western Europe (specimens of which are still preserved at Christiana), were open boats, not exceeding 100 feet in length and 16 in breadth, and propelled partly by oars and partly by a single sail. In fact, neither size, form, equipment, nor means of propulsion are determinative factors upon the question of jurisdiction, which regards only the purpose for which the craft was constructed, and the business in which it is engaged.

The application of this criterion has ruled out the floating dry dock, the floating wharf, the ferry bridge hinged or chained to a wharf, the sailors' Bethel moored to a wharf (Cope v. Valette Dry Dock Co. 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. ed. 501, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336), and a gas float moored as a beacon (The Whitton, [1895] p. 301, [1896] p. 42, [1897] A. C. 337).

But it has been held in England to include a fishing coble, a boat of 10 tons' burden, 24 feet in length, decked forward only, though accustomed to go only 20 miles to sea, and to remain out twelve hours at a time (Ex parte Ferguson, L. R. 6 Q. B. 280); a barge (The Malvina, Lush. 493. Affirmed on appeal, Brown & L. 57); though not a dumb barge, propelled by oars only (Everard v. Kendall, L. R. 5 C. P. 428); and, in America, steamers of 5 tons' burden, engaged in carrying freight and passengers upon navigable waters (The Pioneer, 21 Fed. 426; The Ella B. 24 Fed. 508; The Volunteer, Brown, Adm. 159, Fed. Cas. No. 16,990, Affirmed in 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 59); a barge, without sails or rudder, used for transporting grain (Woods v. The Wilmington, 5 Hughes, 205, 48 Fed. 566); a floating elevator (The Hezekiah Baldwin, 8 Ben. 556, Fed. Cas. No. 6,449). See also The Northern Belle, 9 Wall. 526, 19 L. ed. 748; The Alabama, 22 Fed. 449; Endner v. Greco, 3 Fed. 411.

So far as the Congress of the United States and the Parliament of England have incidentally spoken upon the subject, they have fixed a criterion of size as to what shall be considered a vessel within the admiralty jurisdiction far below the tonnage of an ordinary canal boat. By the original judiciary act of 1789, § 9 (1 Stat. at L. 77, chap. 20, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 455) jurisdiction was given to the district courts of all seizures made "on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of 10 or more tons' burden;" and by the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. at L. 726, chap. 20, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 461) (now obsolete, The Eagle, 8 Wall. 15, 19 L. ed. 365), admiralty jurisdiction was given to vessels navigating the Great Lakes and their connecting waters of 20 tons burden and upwards. By Rev. Stat. § 4311 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2959), vessels of 20 tons and upwards, enrolled and licensed, and vessels of less than 20 tons, not enrolled, but licensed, shall be deemed vessels of the United States; and by § 4520 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3073), all vessels of 50 tons or upwards are required to ship their seamen under written articles. By the English merchants' shipping act of 1854 [17 & 18 Viet. p. 248, chap. 104], the word "ship" shall include every description of vessel used in navigation, not propelled by oars;" and a similar description is given of vessels within the admiralty jurisdiction, in the admiralty court act of 1861.

It seems, however, to be supposed that the fact that boats engaged in traffic upon the Erie canal are drawn by horses is sufficient of itself to exclude them from the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts. This, however, is an argument which appeals less to the reason than to the imagination. So long as the vessel is engaged in commerce and navigation it is difficult to see how the jurisdiction of admiralty is affected by its means of propulsion, which may vary in the course of the same voyage, or with new discoveries made in the art of navigation. Thus, canal boats, upon their arrival at Albany, are at once relieved of their horses, and taken by a steamer in tow *to New York or Jersey City. [32] To hold that such boats are not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts, while on a trip down the Hudson river, would require us to overrule a large number of cases in this court, in which it was assumed by both parties and the court that for damages sustained by collision with other vessels they were entitled to pursue the wrongdoer in courts of admiralty. The Quickstep, 9 Wall. 665, 19 L. ed. 767; The Syracuse, 12 Wall. 167, 20 L. ed. 382; The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302, 23 L. ed. 863; The L. P. Dayton, 120 U. S. 337, 30 L. ed. 669, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 568; The E. A. Packer, 140 U. S. 360, 35 L. ed. 453, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 794. But it would seem like sticking in the bark to hold that a canal boat might recover for a collision while in tow of a tug, but might not recover while in tow of a horse. The case does not raise the question whether hay and oats furnished the horses are necessities within the meaning of the admiralty law, though a casuist might have difficulty in drawing a distinction between coal and oil furnished to one engine of propulsion and hay and oats to another, or between food furnished to a crew and food furnished to the horses.

Replying to the suggestion that, if jurisdiction were sustained of repairs upon a canal boat drawn by horses, it would apply with equal propriety to a blacksmith's bill for shoeing the horses, it is only necessary to say that, for incidental repairs made on land to articles of a ship's furniture or machinery, it has never been supposed that a court of admiralty had jurisdiction. Indeed, it would seem extremely doubtful if liens for these trivial bills were intended to be created by the state law. Articles removed from a vessel and repaired or renovated upon land at the shop of the artisan, stand upon quite a different footing from repairs made upon the vessel herself, and are the subject of a possessory lien at common law.

The truth is, the present employment of horses is a mere accident, and likely to be changed at any time by an enlargement of the canal, now in contemplation, when steam or electricity will probably supplant the present methods of locomotion. The modern law of England and America rules [33] out *of the admiralty jurisdiction all vessels propelled by oars, simply because they are the smallest class and beneath the dignity of a court of admiralty; but long within the historic period, and for at least seven hundred years, the triremes and quadriremes of the Greek and Roman navies were the largest and most powerful vessels afloat.

It is true, the amount involved in this case is a small one, but the jurisdiction of the admiralty court has never been determined by the amount, though appeals from the district court to the supreme court were first limited to cases involving $300, subsequently reduced to $50, and finally, by the court of appeals act, allowed, apparently, in all cases, regardless of amount. [26 Stat. at L. 828, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 549, 550.] So, also, cases may be brought under the patent and copyright laws, quite irrespective of the amount involved.

3. As heretofore observed, the exclusive jurisdiction of the admiralty court in this case was attacked upon the grounds, already discussed, that artificial canals and the vessels plying thereon are not within its jurisdiction. A further suggestion, however, is made, that the contract in this case was not only made on land, but was to be performed on land, and was, in fact, performed on land. This argument must necessarily rest upon the assumption that repairs put upon a vessel while in dry dock are made upon land. We are unwilling to admit this proposition. A dock is an artificial basin in connection with a harbor, used for the reception of vessels in the taking on or discharging of their cargoes, and provided with gates for preventing the rise and fall of the waters occasioned by the tides, and keeping a uniform level within the docks. A dry dock differs from an ordinary dock only in the fact that it is smaller, and, provided with machinery for pumping out the water in order that the vessel may be repaired. All injuries suffered by the hulls of vessels below the water line, by collision or stranding, must necessarily be repaired in a dry dock, to prevent the inflow of water, but it has never been supposed, and it is believed the proposition is now for the first time made, that such repairs were made on land. Had the vessel been *hailed up by ways upon the [34] land and there repaired, a different question might have been presented, as to which we express no opinion; but, as all serious repairs upon the hulls of vessels are made in dry dock, the proposition that such repairs are made on land would practically deprive the admiralty courts of their largest and most important jurisdiction in connection with repairs. No authorities are cited to this proposition, and it is believed none such exist.

Suppose, for instance, it were believed that the repairs could be made upon this vessel without going into dry dock, but it was afterwards discovered that the injuries were more extensive and that a dry dock were necessary; would a court of admiralty thereby be deprived of jurisdiction? Or, suppose such repairs were made in a floating dry dock, as sometimes happens, would they be considered as made upon land or water? Or, suppose they were made in dry dock upon a seagoing vessel?

There is no doubt of the proposition that a dry dock itself is not a subject of salvage service or of admiralty jurisdiction, because it is not used for the purpose of navigation. That was settled in Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co. 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. ed. 501, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336. But the case was put upon the express ground that a dry dock was like a ferry bridge or sailors' floating meeting house, and was no more used for the purposes of navigation than a wharf or a warehouse projecting into or upon the water.

4. Suggestion is also made that the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts does not extend to contracts for the repair of vessels engaged wholly in commerce within a state. It is true that, as late as 1853, in The Fashion (Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. 244, 16 L. ed. 110), it was held that, under the act of Congress of 1845, extending jurisdiction of the Federal courts to vessels employed in navigation upon the Great Lakes, between ports and places in different states, it did not extend to the case of a shipment of goods from a port in one state to another port in the same state; and that, in the case of The Goliath (Maguire v. Card, 21 How.

[35]248, 16 L. ed. 118), the same doctrine *was extended to a contract for supplies furnished to a vessel engaged in trade between different ports in the state of California. These cases, however, were practically overruled by that of The Belfast, 7 Wall. 624, 19 L. ed. 266, in which a state statute, similar to the statute of New York involved in this case, for a breach of contract of affreightment between ports in the same state (Alabama), was held to be unconstitutional and void, although the shipment was between ports of the same state. The contention was distinctly made (p. 635, L. ed. p. 269), that the state court had jurisdiction because the contract of affreightment was between ports and places in the same state, but it was as distinctly disclaimed by the court, and the prior cases practically overruled. So, also, in Ex parte Boyer, 109 U. S. 629, 27 L. ed. 1056, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434, the doctrine of The Belfast was reiterated and applied to a collision between canal boats, Mr. Justice Blatchford saying that "it makes no difference, as to the jurisdiction of the district court, that one or the other of the vessels was, at the time of the collision, on a voyage from one place in the state of Illinois to another place in that state." To the same effect are The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999; The Montello, 20 Wall. 430, 22 L. ed. 391; The Commerce, 1 Black, 574, sub nom. Commercial Transp. Co. v. Fitzhugh, 17 L. ed. 107, and Lord v. Goodall, N. & P. S. S. Co. 102 U. S. 541, 26 L. ed. 224.

So, too, in Re Garnett, 141 U. S. 1, 35 L. ed. 631, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 840, the limited liability act was held to be a part of the law of the United States, enforceable upon navigable rivers above tide waters, and applicable to vessels engaged in commerce between ports in the same states. [9 Stat. at L. 635, chap. 43, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2943.] In delivering the opinion Mr. Justice Bradley said (p. 15, L. ed. p. 634, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 843): "In some of the cases it was held, distinctly, that this jurisdiction does not depend on the question of foreign or interstate commerce, but also exists where the voyage or contract, if maritime in character, is made and to be performed wholly within a single state,"—citing all the cases noticed in this opinion.

In The E. M. McChesney, 8 Ben. 150, Fed. Cas. No. 4,463, Judge Blatchford, more recently of this court, sustained a libel against a canal boat for nondelivery of a cargo ship-[36]ped on a canal boat in *Buffalo to be carried to New York. In that case, as in this, it was contended that neither the canal, nor the canal boat, were subjects of the admiralty jurisdiction. The case is directly in point.

191 U. S. U. S., Book 48.

It is believed that, since the case of The Belfast, the distinction has never been admitted between contracts concerning vessels engaged in trade between ports of the same, and between ports of different, states. Of course, nothing herein said is intended to trench upon the common-law jurisdiction of the state courts, which is, and always has been, expressly saved to suitors "where the common law is competent to give it." Rev. Stat. § 563, sub. 8 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 457). By that law, an action will always lie against the master or owner of the vessel, and, if the laws of the state permit it, the vessel may be attached as the property of the defendant in the case. But, as remarked by Mr. Justice Miller in The Pine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 555, 571, 18 L. ed. 451, 456: A statute providing that a vessel may be sued and made defendant without any proceeding against the owners, or even mentioning their names, partakes of all the essential features of an admiralty proceeding in rem, of which exclusive jurisdiction is given to the district courts of the United States. See also The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411, 427, 18 L. ed. 397, 400, wherein it is said: "The action against the boat by name, authorized by the statute of California, is a proceeding in the nature, and with the incidents, of a suit in admiralty. The distinguishing and characteristic feature of such suit is that the vessel or thing proceeded against is itself seized and impleaded as the defendant, and is judged and sentenced accordingly."

In The Belfast, 7 Wall. 624, 19 L. ed. 266, a proceeding was taken in a state court in Alabama for the enforcement of a lien for the loss of certain cotton. The statute was, in its essentials, a reproduction of the New York statute under consideration. Plaintiffs contended that, admitting the admiralty courts had jurisdiction, the state courts had concurrent jurisdiction to afford the parties the same remedies. It was held that state *legislatures had no authority to [37] create a maritime lien, or to enforce such a lien by a suit or proceeding in rem, as practised in the admiralty courts.

In all these cases the distinction is sharply drawn between a common-law action in personam, with a concurrent attachment against the goods and chattels of the defendant, subject, of course, to any existing liens, and a proceeding in rem against the vessel as the debtor or "offending thing," which is the characteristic of a suit in admiralty. The same distinction is carefully preserved in the general admiralty rules prescribed by this court; rule 2d declaring that, in suits in personam, the mesne process may be "by a warrant of arrest of the person of the defendant, with a clause therein that, if he cannot be found, to attach his goods and chattels to the amount sued for;" and rule 9, that in suits and proceedings in rem the process shall be by warrant of arrest of the ship, goods, or other things to be arrested, with public notice to be given in the newspapers. The former is in strict analogy to a common-law proceeding, and is a concurrent remedy. The latter is a proceeding distinctively maritime, of which exclusive jurisdiction is given to the admiralty courts.

That the New York statute belongs to the latter class is evident from the Code, by which, upon written application to a justice of the supreme court, a warrant is issued for the seizure of the vessel, and for an order to show cause why it should not be sold to satisfy the lien. The warrant in this case recites "that an application had been made to me . . . for a warrant to enforce a lien against the canal boat or vessel called Rob't W. Parsons," and commands the sheriff "to seize and safely keep said canal boat to satisfy said claim . . . as above set forth, to be a lien upon said vessel according to law." The proceeding authorized by the New York statute in question was held to be in the nature of a suit in admiralty in Bird v. The Josephine, 39 N. Y. 19, and Brookman v. Hamill, 43 N. Y. 554, 3 Am. Rep. 731. The proceeding is also similar to that provided by the laws of Massachusetts, which, in the case of The Glide, 167 U. S. 606, 42 L. ed. 296, 17 Sup. Ct. [38] Rep. 930, *was held to be, as to repairs and supplies in the home port, exclusively within the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

As § 30 of the New York statute excludes a debt which is not a lien by the maritime law, and § 3419, providing for their enforcement, also excludes liens founded upon a maritime contract, we think the state courts were in error in enforcing this lien, thereby holding that a contract for the repair of a canal boat while lying in the Erie canal was not a maritime contract, and that the statute so construed is pro tanto unconstitutional.

The judgment of the court below must, therefore, be reversed, and the case remanded to the Supreme Court of the State of New York for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Brewer, dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion and judgment in this case, and deem the matter of sufficient importance to justify an expression of my reasons therefor.

It is well to understand exactly the facts of the case. Sections 30 and 35 of the Laws of New York, 1897, chap. 418, are quoted in the opinion of the court. By the first, a lien is given on a seagoing or ocean-bound vessel, if the amount of the debt is $50 or upwards, and on any other vessel if $15 or upwards. And, among other things, the lien is for work done, or material or other articles furnished, for the building or repairing of such vessel. By the second, the lien, if founded upon a maritime contract, can be enforced only in the United States courts; if not founded upon such a contract, by proceedings in the state courts, in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure.

The canal boat, upon which the lien was claimed, was not a seagoing or ocean-bound vessel, but engaged in carrying merchandise between Buffalo and other ports within the limits of the state of New York. The statements in two affidavits, *one of the plaintiff [39] and the other the defendant (the plaintiff being the owner of the claim, and the defendant the owner of the boat), were, by stipulation between the parties, agreed upon as the facts in the case. No question was made of the justice of the claim or the liability of the owner of the boat therefor. The work consisted in "permanent repairs upon the boat," in this, that "a part of one side of said boat was taken out and her cheek plank removed, and the side of the boat and the cheek plank were rebuilt into said boat." The work was done upon dry docks belonging to the plaintiff in the village of Middleport, a village located on the Erie canal. The boat, at the time, was on a trip from New York to Buffalo. The value of these permanent repairs was $154.40, and the boat, when thus repaired, sold for only $155. Further, according to the bill of particulars, 727 feet of lumber, 47 bolts, 165 pounds of spikes, and 265 pounds of iron, as well as three hundred and thirty-four hours of labor, which, at ten hours a day, amounted to over thirty-three days, were used in the work. The size of the canal boat is not given, but, from this statement as to the amount and value of the work, it is evident that the repairs might well be considered a rebuilding of the boat. Be that as it may, the contract was made on land, to be performed on land, and was, in fact, performed on land. The plaintiff was a canal-boat builder, having dry docks and yards at the village of Middleport, and on these dry docks the work was done.

Was this a maritime contract? A contract for building a ship or supplying materials for her construction is not a maritime contract. People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. 393, 15 L. ed. 961; Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. 129, 16 L. ed. 294. In the former of these cases the court said (p. 402, L. ed. p. 965): "So far from the contract being purely maritime, and touching rights and duties appertaining to navigation (on the ocean or elsewhere), it was a contract made on land, to be performed on land."

So, in Sheppard v. Steele, 43 N. Y. 52, 56, 3 Am. Rep. 660, 662:

"The claim here is for labor upon the hull of a vessel, while in the process of construction, before launching, while yet on *the land. This is not a maritime contract. It is one relating to a subject on the land, and it is to be performed on the land. The admiralty courts have no jurisdiction for its enforcement. Foster v. The Richard Busteed, 100 Mass. 409, 1 Am. Rep. 125."

That a dry dock is to be considered as land in the maritime law seems to be clear from the decision of this court in Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co. 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. ed. 501, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336, in which it was held that a dry dock was not a subject of salvage service, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, saying (p. 627, L. ed. p. 502, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 337): "A fixed structure, such as this dry dock is, not used for the purpose of navigation, is not a subject of salvage service, any more than is a wharf or a warehouse when projecting into or upon the water." The dry dock referred to in this case was a floating dock fastened by chains to the bank of the Mississippi river. Whether the dock in this case was likewise fastened by chains, or a structure permanently attached to the land, does not appear. Certainly, it cannot be presumed, for the purpose of reversing the judgments of the state courts, that it was not permanently attached to, and as much a part of, the land, as a bridge or a wharf.

In this connection, reference may be had to Bradley v. Bolles, Abb. Adm. 569, Fed. Cas. No. 1,773, in which it was held by Judge Betts that work done upon a vessel in a dry dock in scraping her bottom, preparatory to coppering her, is not of a maritime character, and that compensation for such labor cannot be recovered in a court of admiralty. Judge Betts says, in his opinion, that the court had repeatedly held that contracts of that description do not constitute a lien upon vessels which can be enforced in admiralty. In Boon v. The Hornet, Crabbe, 426, Fed. Cas. No. 1,640, a canal boat was hauled on shore on the bank of a river where the tide ebbed and flowed, and there repaired. It was held that, although the law of the state gave a lien, the admiralty court would not take cognizance of such a claim.

So, also, where damage is done wholly upon the land, admiralty will not take jurisdiction, although the cause of the *damage originated on waters subject to its jurisdiction. The Plymouth, 3 Wall. 20, sub nom. Hough v. Western Transp. Co. 18 L. ed. 125; Ex parte Phenix Ins. Co. 118 U. S. 610, 191 U. S.

30 L. ed. 274, 7 Sup. St. Rep. 25; Johnson v. Chicago & P. Elevator Co. 119 U. S. 388, 30 L. ed. 447, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254. Two of these were cases in which fire originating on a vessel communicated to property on land, and the owner of the property attempted to recover in the admiralty courts, but their jurisdiction was denied. The other was where a vessel, while being towed in the Chicago river, struck and damaged a building on the land. For this damage, an action was maintained in the state court, and the jurisdiction of that court upheld. It would seem to follow from these cases that a contract made on land, to be performed on land, and, in fact, performed on land, is not subject to admiralty jurisdiction; and, likewise, that a tort resulting in injury to something on the land is, also, not subject to admiralty jurisdiction, although the tort was on waters subject to such jurisdiction. It is true, many cases may be found in which it is stated, generally, that admiralty has jurisdiction of claims for repairs upon vessels, but, evidently, that contemplates repairs made while the vessel is in the water.

In this connection, I notice a statement in the opinion of the court, that "for incidental repairs made on land to articles of a ship's furniture or machinery, it has never been supposed that a court of admiralty had jurisdiction." But if an engine be taken out of a steam tug and repaired on land, and a court of admiralty has no jurisdiction of the claim for such repairs, has it any more claim when the hull of a canal boat is brought on the land and the side of it replaced? In each case the contract is one performed on the land, and, although having ultimate relation to navigation on the water, it is not, of itself, directly connected with navigation.

Further, no objection can, of course, be made to the New York statutes. Section 30 gives a lien, and no one questions the power of a state to provide for such a lien to be enforced in some court. Section 35 provides that, if the lien is founded on a maritime contract, it is enforceable only in the courts of the *United States. Surely, that is as far [42] as the most strenuous advocates of an extended admiralty jurisdiction can claim, and it is only in those cases, as the section provides, where the lien is not founded upon a maritime contract that the state courts may exercise jurisdiction. The state courts of New York, from the trial through the supreme to the court of appeals, have all held that this lien was not founded upon a maritime contract. Upon what just ground can this court disturb this finding? If it be a pure question of fact, we have often held that we are bound by the action of the state courts. If it is one partly of fact and partly of law, then, surely, we ought not, except in the clearest case, to reverse those courts.

Still again, it has been repeatedly declared by this court, following the statute, that a claim cognizable in admiralty can be enforced in the state courts by common-law remedies. Now, whatever may be the nature of the contract (the foundation of the lien in this instance), the only provision in § 35 is that it can be enforced in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure.

Turning to the Code of Civil Procedure, we find, in title 4 of chapter 23, the provisions for the enforcement of liens on vessels. These provisions are, first, the lienor is to make a written application to a justice of the supreme court for a warrant to enforce the lien and to collect the amount thereof, which application must state substantially the same facts as in an ordinary pleading to enforce a mechanic's lien on buildings. § 3420. Upon the filing of such application, the justice is directed to issue a warrant for the seizure of the vessel, and, at the same time, to grant an order to show cause why the vessel should not be sold to satisfy the lien. A copy of the order and the application for the warrant must be served personally upon the master or other person in charge of the vessel, "and personally upon the owner and consignee of such vessel if a resident of the state, or, if not a resident of the state, by mail addressed to such owner or consignee at his last known place [43] of residence, within ten days after the *execution of such warrant." §§ 3422 and 3423. By § 3424, the applicant is also required to give notice, in some paper published in the county where the vessel was seized, "stating the issuance of the warrant, the date thereof, the amount of the claim specified therein, the name of the applicant, and the time and place of the return of the order to show cause." By § 3425, the owner or consignee, or any other person interested, may appear and contest the claim of the lienor. Subsequent provisions authorize an appeal, as in other civil cases. The record shows that the proceedings had were substantially in accordance with these provisions. The application, called a petition, was filed, setting forth all the facts required, including the name of the owner. An order of sale and an order to show cause were both issued, and the owner appeared in response to such notice. It is true, there is in the record no proof of service upon the owner, but the fact of her appearance to contest the application is shown. It is also true that she did not, after her appearance, contest the amount of the claim, but contented herself with challenging the jurisdiction of the court. But such action on her part does not obviate the fact that the proceedings on behalf of the petitioner were substantially those to collect a civil debt by attachment against the property of the defendant. In this connection, reference may be had to The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 555, 18 L. ed. 451, in which an Iowa statute was held unconstitutional, but, as said by Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court on page 571, L. ed. p. 456, describing the remedy provided for by that statute:

"The remedy pursued in the Iowa courts, in the case before us, is in no sense a common-law remedy. It is a remedy partaking of all the essential features of an admiralty proceeding in rem. The statute provides that the vessel may be sued and made defendant without any proceeding against the owners, or even mentioning their names. That a writ may be issued and the vessel seized, on filing a petition similar, in substance, to a libel. That, after a notice in the nature of a monition, *the vessel may be [44] condemned and an order made for her sale, if the liability is established for which she was sued. Such is the general character of the steamboat laws of the western states."

But in the very same case it was also said by the learned justice:

"While the proceeding differs thus from a common-law remedy, it is also essentially different from what are in the west called suits by attachment, and, in some of the older states, foreign attachments. In these cases there is a suit against a personal defendant by name, and, because of inability to serve process on him on account of nonresidence, or for some other reason mentioned in the various statutes allowing attachments to issue, the suit is commenced by a writ directing the proper officer to attach sufficient property of the defendant to answer any judgment which may be rendered against him. This proceeding may be had against an owner or part owner of a vessel, and his interest thus subjected to sale in a common-law court of the state.

"Such actions may also be maintained in personam against a defendant in the common-law courts, as the common law gives; all in consistence with the grant of admiralty powers in the 9th section of the judiciary act."

So, in the case at bar, we have a proceeding authorized by the statute in which the owner is named, and notice required to be served on him, and notice in fact served, an appearance of the defendant, and an opportunity to try the merits of the claim, as in any other civil action.

That a state has full control over the practice and procedure to be pursued in its courts has been often adjudged. Thus, in Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 31, sub nom. Bowman v. Lewis, 25 L. ed. 989, 992, it was said by Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court:

"We might go still further, and say, with undoubted truth, that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent any state from adopting any system of laws or judicature it sees fit for all or any part of its territory."

[45] *Again, in Ex parte Reggel, 114 U. S. 642, 651, 29 L. ed. 250, 253, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1148, 1153, Mr. Justice Harlan used these words:

"That commonwealth [Pennsylvania] has the right to establish the forms of pleadings and process to be observed in her own courts, in both civil and criminal cases, subject only to those provisions of the Constitution of the United States involving the protection of life, liberty, and property in all the states of the Union."

So Mr. Justice White, speaking for the court, in Iowa C. R. Co. v. Iowa, 160 U. S. 389, 393, 40 L. ed. 467, 469, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 344, 345, declared:

"But it is clear that the 14th Amendment in no way undertakes to control the power of a state to determine by what process legal rights may be asserted or legal obligations be enforced, provided the method of procedure adopted for these purposes gives reasonable notice, and affords fair opportunity to be heard before the issues are decided."

But it is said that, while this is generally true, there is this limitation, that the state cannot, as to claims against vessels, adopt the procedure now obtaining in admiralty cases, or, without actual notice to the owner, seize and sell a vessel in satisfaction of a lien. Of course, it is not necessary to determine that question, because, as I have stated, there was notice to the owner and an appearance by her, and such proceeding was authorized by the statute. But, even if it was not so authorized, and was simply a direct proceeding to enforce a lien upon the vessel and sell it in satisfaction thereof, I insist that the state courts may entertain jurisdiction. It was held in Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 33 L. ed. 918, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557, that a state may provide by statute that the title to real estate within its limits shall be settled and determined by a suit in which the defendant, being a nonresident, is only brought into court by publication. The question was discussed at length, the author-that the state had such jurisdiction over real estate within its limits that it could determine the title without the personal presence of the owner. But has the state any less jurisdiction over personalty situated within its borders than it has over real estate? Upon what theory of state power can it be held that a state may divest a nonresident of his title to real estate, and not a nonresident of his title to personal property? There seems to be a contention that there is a peculiar sanctity in the form of admiralty proceedings which excludes the state from resort to them, but the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts does not depend on the form of the procedure. Congress may, if it see fit, change entirely that procedure. As said by Chief Justice Taney in The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. 460, 13 L. ed. 1065:

[46] ities *reviewed, and the conclusion reached

"The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to 'all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.' But it does not direct that the court shall proceed according to ancient and established forms, or shall adopt any other form or mode of practice. The grant defines the subjects to which the jurisdiction may be extended by Congress. But the extent of the power, as well as the mode of proceeding in which that jurisdiction is to be exercised, like the power and practice in all the other courts of the United States, are subject to the regulation of Congress, except where that power is limited by the terms of the Constitution, or by necessary implication from its language. In admiralty and maritime cases, there is no such limitation as to the mode of proceeding, and Congress may, therefore, in cases of that description, give either party right of trial by jury, or modify the practice of the court in any other respect that it deems more conducive to the administration of justice."

Suppose Congress should exercise this power, and substitute for the procedure in admiralty courts the common-law practice, and make it the only method of procedure therein. What would become of the argument that the state cannot resort to the procedure obtaining in admiralty courts for enforcing *the rights of claimants? Must it, [47] then, desist from common-law remedies because they have been adopted in admiralty and go back to that form of procedure now obtaining in the admiralty courts? Can it be that the power of a state to vest jurisdiction in one of its courts depends upon the form of procedure which it adopts?

Why should we be so anxious to drive parties having small claims away from their local courts to courts not infrequently held at a great distance? Why should we be so anxious to force litigants into a court where there is no constitutional right to a trial by jury? I, for one, believe that the right of trial by jury is not to be taken away from a claimant unless it be a case coming clearly within the well-established limits of equity and admiralty cases. I do not like to see these provisions, which have so long been the boast of our Anglo-Saxon system of procedure, frittered away by either legislative or judicial action.

Further, it seems a great hardship that a party who has been brought into a court of general jurisdiction, with full opportunity to litigate the claim of the plaintiff, and has carried the case through all the courts of the state without ever disputing its validity, should now obtain a reversal of the entire proceedings when such reversal may operate to prevent the collection of the debt. By § 33 of chapter 418, heretofore referred to, the lien expires at the expiration of twelve months from the time the debt was contracted. Of course, the lien is now gone. The canal boat has very likely disappeared, and the owner may be entirely irresponsible.

Even if these objections to the opinion and judgment of the court are wholly without foundation, there is still another, broader and deeper. I do not believe that, under the true interpretation of the Constitution, the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts extends to contracts for the repairs of vessels engaged wholly in commerce within a state. I recognize the fact that this court has decided in a series of cases, commencing with The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [48] 443, 13 L. ed. 1058, that *the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts is not limited by tide waters, as admiralty jurisdiction was understood to be limited, both in Great Britain and in this country, at the time the Constitution was framed, but extends to all navigable waters of the United States; and I have no disposition to question the correctness of those decisions, or in any way limit their scope. But what is admiralty? It is the law, not of the water, but of the seas.

As said in Edwards, Admiralty Jurisdiction, p. 29:

"But its jurisdiction may be said to rest generally on the following considerations: First, the nature of the property to be adjudicated upon; secondly, the question to be decided; thirdly, the origin of the cause; and fourthly, the locality; and these must be of the sea to give the admiralty a jurisdiction."

So, also, in Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. 532, 553, 22 L. ed. 487, 491, is this declaration of this court:

"Maritime contracts are such as relate to commerce and navigation, and, unless a contract to build a ship is to be regarded as a maritime contract, it will hardly be contended that a contract to furnish the materials to be used in accomplishing that object can fall within that category, as the latter is more strictly a contract made on land, and to be performed on land, than the former, and is certainly one stage further removed from any immediate and direct relation to commerce and navigation."

It grew up out of the fact that the ocean is not the territorial property of any nation, but the common property of all; that vessels engaged in commerce between the different nations ought, so far as possible, to be subject to a uniform law, and not annoyed by the conflicting local laws and customs of the several nations which they visit. I do not mean that the several maritime nations did not establish different rules, or that there is not some dissimilarity in their maritime laws, for, as long as each nation is the master of its own territory, it may legislate as it sees fit in reference to maritime matters coming within its jurisdiction, and yet this does not abridge the fact *that admiralty [49] grew up out of the thought of having a common law of the seas. It was well said by Mr. Justice Bradley in The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 558, 572, sub nom. Rodd v. Heartt, 22 L. ed. 654, 661:

"Perhaps the maritime law is more uniformly followed by commercial nations than the civil and common laws are by those who use them. But, like those laws, however fixed, definite, and beneficial the theoretical code of maritime law may be, it can have only so far the effect of law in any country as it is permitted to have. But the actual maritime law can hardly be said to have a fixed and definite form as to all the subjects which may be embraced within its scope. Whilst it is true that the great mass of maritime law is the same in all commercial countries, yet in each country peculiarities exist, either as to some of the rules, or in the mode of enforcing them. Especially is this the case on the outside boundaries of the law, where it comes in contact with, or shades off into, the local or municipal law of the particular country, and affects only its own merchants or people in their relations to each other. Whereas, in matters affecting the stranger or foreigner, the commonly received law of the whole commercial world is more assiduously observed,—as, in justice, it should be. No one doubts that every nation may adopt its own maritime code. France may adopt one, England another, the United States a third; still, the convenience of the commercial world, bound together, as it is, by mutual relations of trade and intercourse, demands that, in all essential things wherein these relations bring them in contact, there should be a uniform law founded on natural reason and justice. Hence the adoption by all commercial nations (our own included) of the general maritime law as the basis and groundwork of all their maritime regulations.

[50] . . . Each state adopts the maritime law, not as a code having any independent or inherent force, proprio vigore, but as its own law, with such modifications and qualifications as it sees fit. Thus adopted, and thus qualified in each case, it becomes the maritime law of the particular nation that adopts it. And without such voluntary adoption *it would not be law. And thus it happens that, from the general practice of commercial nations in making the same general law the basis and groundwork of their respective maritime systems, the great mass of maritime law which is thus received by these nations in common comes to be the common maritime law of the world."

In the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, in The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. 443, 13 L. ed. 1058, in which this court for the first time held that the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts extended above tide water, the argument is thus stated (p. 454, L. ed. p. 1063):

"In England, undoubtedly the writers upon the subject, and the decisions in its courts of admiralty, always speak of the jurisdiction as confined to tide water. And this definition in England was a sound and reasonable one, because there was no navigable stream in the country beyond the ebb and flow of the tide; nor any place where a port could be established to carry on trade with a foreign nation, and where vessels could enter or depart with cargoes. In England, therefore, 'tide water' and 'navigable water' are synonymous terms, and 'tide water,' with a few small and unimportant exceptions, meant nothing more than public rivers, as contradistinguished from private ones; and they took the ebb and flow of the tide as the test, because it was a convenient one, and more easily determined the character of the river. Hence, the established doctrine in England, that the admiralty jurisdiction is confined to the ebb and flow of the tide. In other words, it is confined to public navigable waters.

"At the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted, and our courts of admiralty went into operation, the definition which had been adopted in England was equally proper here. In the old thirteen states, the far greater part of the navigable waters are tide waters. And in the states which were, at that period, in any degree commercial, and where courts of admiralty were called on to exercise their jurisdiction, every public river was tide water to the head of navigation. And, indeed, until the [51] discovery of steamboats, *there could be nothing like foreign commerce upon waters with an unchanging current resisting the upward passage. The courts of the United States, therefore, naturally adopted the English mode of defining a public river, and, consequently, the boundary of admiralty jurisdiction. It measured it by tide water. And that definition, having found its way into our courts, became, after a time, the familiar mode of describing a public river, and was repeated, as cases occurred, without particularly examining whether it was as universally applicable in this country as it was in England."

Again, as said by this court, in The Commerce, 1 Black, 574, 579, sub nom. Commercial Transp. Co. v. Fitzhugh, 17 L. ed. 107, 109:

"All such waters are, in truth, but arms of the sea, and are as much within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States as the sea itself."

Such being the general nature of admiralty, and the jurisdiction of its courts being understood, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, to relate to the ocean and the arms thereof, with the view of uniformity in respect to international commerce, what was granted to the general government when to its courts was given exclusive jurisdiction over "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction?" Did it mean that the judicial power of the United States should extend to controversies respecting contracts and torts concerning every vessel upon all the waters of the several states? It is not pretended that it did. Take an inland lake, wholly within the limits of the territory of a state and having no connection with the ocean. The admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts does not extend to contracts or collisions in respect to, or upon, such waters. The Montello, 11 Wall. 411, 20 L. ed. 191. But why should the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts not extend to landlocked waters wholly within the limits of a state, when it does extend to waters having connection with the ocean? Clearly, as shown by the quotation from Chief Justice Taney's opinion in The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, because, since the use of steam, foreign commerce may extend into such *waters, and, [52] therefore, the full exercise of the admiralty jurisdiction which concerns the law of the sea requires that that jurisdiction should be coextensive with waters which may be traversed by ocean-going vessels. It matters not whether such waters are natural or artificial highways, canals or rivers. If they open to the ocean, or are connected with the ocean, they become, or may become, the highways of ocean commerce, and, therefore, in order that the admiralty jurisdiction may be fully exercised, it was held, and rightfully, in The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, that it extends to all navigable waters of the United States. Take the case of a landlocked lake within the limits of New York. Unquestionably, the state has full jurisdiction over its waters and the vessels traversing them. The admiralty courts of the United States would not assume any jurisdiction. Can it be that, if the state of New York constructs a canal, by which the waters of that lake are connected with the ocean, it is deprived of its full jurisdiction over those waters and the vessels traversing them? Doubtless, to a certain extent, and for the purpose of fully effectuating the admiralty jurisdiction of the nation, the Federal courts in admiralty would have a certain jurisdiction. Take the case of The Diana, Lush. 539, in which Dr. Lushington assumed jurisdiction over a collision between two British vessels in the Great North Holland canal. Can it for a moment be supposed that the English admiralty courts would take jurisdiction of a claim for repairs made on a Dutch canal boat in such canal? Or, to bring the case nearer home, would the British admiralty courts take jurisdiction of the claim of this plaintiff for the work done upon the defendant's canal boat? Or, would the admiralty courts of the United States take jurisdiction of a like action brought for repairs done to a canal boat on the canal between Liverpool and Manchester? Clearly, these matters are of local significance, and of local significance alone.

If it be said that the state of New York, in the case cited, would, notwithstanding [53] the construction of a canal between *the thitherto landlocked lake and the ocean, still retain jurisdiction to enforce claims for repairs, but only by proceedings according to the course of the common law, I reply that, while it remained still a landlocked lake with no connection with the ocean, the state of New York having full jurisdiction, could, as we have seen, resort to any proceeding it saw fit for the enforcement of claims for repairs. It has full control over its own procedure, and may change and alter it as it sees fit.

Can it be that, having such power before the waters are connected with the ocean, it loses that power by the act of connecting the waters of the ocean, and is deprived of its thitherto unquestioned control over the remedies it chooses to provide?

But it is said that, given the fact that the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts extends to all navigable waters of the United States, and that such jurisdiction is exclusive, it follows that, the moment any navigable waters are connected with the ocean, the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over those waters becomes exclusive. In this case we touch upon the difference between contracts and torts. As said in The Belfast, 7 Wall. 624, 637, 19 L. ed. 266, 270:

"Principal subjects of admiralty jurisdiction are maritime contracts and maritime torts, including captures jure belli, and seizures on water for municipal and revenue forfeitures.

"(1) Contracts, claims, or service, purely maritime and touching rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation, are cognizable in the admiralty.

"(2) Torts or injuries committed on navigable waters, of a civil nature, are also cognizable in the admiralty courts.

"Jurisdiction in the former case depends upon the nature of the contract, but in the latter it depends entirely upon locality."

We have here no matter of torts, but simply one of contract. The question, therefore, is not one of locality, but one of the nature of the contract. The contract was for work done, not on an ocean-going vessel or one capable of engaging in foreign *commerce, or, [54] like a tug, The Glide, 167 U. S. 606, 42 L. ed. 296, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 930, one which can be used directly in assisting foreign commerce, but a canal boat necessarily used only on inland waters, and in fact only so used. Can this fairly be adjudged a maritime contract? I think not. Wilson v. Lawrence, 82 N. Y. 409; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. 532, 22 L. ed. 487. In addition to the fact that this boat was designed primarily for use upon a canal, to be drawn by animals moving on the land, the place at which the work was done is also worthy of consideration. While the admiralty jurisdiction may extend to canals, yet the United States have no such exclusive control over canals as over natural navigable waters. The canal was built by the state, is owned by the state, and it cannot for one moment be assumed that the national government can interfere to restrict the state as to the size of the canal, the depth of water, the construction of bridges, or other things in respect to which it has full control over the natural navigable waters. It seems an anomaly that, when the state builds a waterway and owns a waterway, and has a general control over that waterway, it cannot provide as it sees fit for enforcing claims for work done on vessels navigating such highway when the vessels are of a character which prevents them being used for any foreign commerce.

Recapitulating: I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court, because, first, I think the contract, being made on land, for work to be done on land, and in fact done upon the land, is not a maritime contract, and therefore cannot be a subject of admiralty jurisdiction. Second, the proceeding which was instituted was authorized by the statutes of the state, and in its essential features an ordinary proceeding according to the course of the common law, which may always be resorted to even in respect to contracts which are of a strictly maritime nature. Third, because the grant to the national government over admiralty and maritime matters was in furtherance of commerce between this nation and others, and designed to secure uniformity in respect thereto, and does not extend to contracts made in respect to vessels which are incapable of being used for foreign commerce, designed and used exclusively for mere local traffic within a state.

[55] I am authorized to say that the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Peckham concur in this dissent.

Mr. Justice Harlan also dissents.

ROBERT R. WRIGHT, Jr., as Mayor of the City of Denver, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ELLEN TERESA MORGAN et al.

Public lands—patent to municipality—alienable title—municipal power to sell burial ground—informality in executing sale—conformity of deed to common council resolution.

1. An absolute, alienable title was acquired by the city of Denver, Colorado, under a patent purporting to convey to the "mayor in trust for said city and to his successors" land which had been purchased pursuant to the act of May 21, 1872, authorizing the mayor of that city to enter at the minimum price certain lands "to be held and used for a burial place for said city and vicinity."
2. A general power of alienation conferred upon a city by its charter extends to the alienation of property owned by it and devoted to burial purposes.
3. The informality in a sale of real property by a municipality, arising from the execution of the deed by the mayor rather than by a special commissioner, will not sustain ejectment by the municipality to recover back the land after the purchase price has been received by the city, and the land occupied by the purchaser for nearly twenty years.
4. A deed from a municipality to a person incorrectly described as the bishop of Colorado, habendum to him, his heirs, and assigns, is within the authority conferred by a resolution of the common council, granting the petition of the grantee, who was the Roman Catholic bishop of Denver, for a conveyance to him and his successors in office.

Argued October 13, 14, 1903. Decided October 26, 1903.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit to review a judgment ordered for defendants on exceptions to a judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Colorado in favor of plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

See same case below, 45 C. C. A. 421, 106 Fed. 452.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frederick A. Williams and Halsted L. Ritter argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Clay B. Whitford, Greeley W. Whitford, and Henry E. May, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The act of 1872 and the patent should be construed together.

Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 3; Torrence v. Shedd, 112 Ill. 466; Watson v. Boylston, 5 Mass. 411; Stuyvesant v. Western Mortg. & Invest. Co. 22 Colo. 28, 43 Pac. 144; Clough v. Bowman, 15 N. H. 504.

The rules applicable to conditions precedent and subsequent, in ordinary conveyancing between individuals, have no application here.

An act of Congress granting land should neither be enlarged by ingenious reasoning, nor diminished by strained construction. The construction must be reasonable, and such as will give effect to the intention of Congress.

A limitation is implied from the declaration of Congress that it was granted for the given purpose.

Lake Superior Ship Canal, R. & Iron Co. v. Cunningham, 155 U. S. 354, 39 L. ed. 183, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 103.

The lands, being held for a public trust, were inalienable for any purpose.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment brought in the Colorado state court and removed to the circuit court of the United States. The case was tried in the latter court, and a verdict and judgment were ordered for the plaintiff on the undisputed facts. On exceptions, a judgment was ordered for the defendants by the circuit court of appeals (45 C. C. A. 421, 106 Fed. 452, see 25 C. C. A. 97, 49 U. S. App. 126, 79 Fed. 577), and the case was brought here by writ of error. The defendants claim title under a sale by the city of Denver and a deed executed by the mayor of the city. The plaintiff contends that the act of Congress under which the original patent was granted made the land inalienable; that the patent did not give the city a legal title; that the city had no power to convey; that the alleged authority of the city to the mayor to execute the deed was insufficient; and that the deed did not follow the resolution upon which the defendants rely.

The act of Congress, approved May 21, 1872, chap. 187 (17 Stat. at L. 140), was entitled "An Act to Enable the City of Denver to Purchase Certain Lands in Colorado for a Cemetery;" and it authorized the mayor of the city to enter, at the minimum price, certain lands, including the land in question, "to be held and used for a burial place for said city and vicinity." The price was paid, and a patent was issued purporting to convey to the "mayor, in trust for said city, and to his successors," the said land, not referring to the above act otherwise than by the words "in conformity with the several acts of Congress in such case made and provided." This patent was confirmed by an act of Congress approved January 25, 1890, chap. 3 (26 Stat. at L. 2); and the city of Denver was authorized "to vacate the use of the said land, or any portion thereof, as a cemetery, and to appropriate and use the same or any part thereof for a public park or grounds."

[57] *After the passage of the first act, Joseph P. Machebœuf, the Roman Catholic bishop of Denver, made a petition to the mayor and common council of Denver, representing that in 1863 he had purchased a part of the said lands, and that the same had been, and was, used as a burial place, and asking for a conveyance to him and his successors in office. A committee recommended that the petition be granted, and the council voted to adopt the report. On February 6, 1874, for a stipulated price which was received, a deed was executed by the mayor in the name of the city to Machebœuf, described as bishop of Colorado, habendum to him, his heirs and assigns, "for the purposes aforesaid." The land in controversy is a part of the land embraced in this deed, and, never having been used for burial, was conveyed by Machebœuf to the defendants' predecessor in title.

On the foregoing facts, it is sufficiently evident that the plaintiff has no title, and that would be enough to show that the judgment must be affirmed. The action is brought by the present mayor in his own name, not by the city. Furthermore, it also is plain enough that the city did get a title by the patent. The first act of Congress contemplated a purchase by the city, and the patent was to the mayor in trust for the city. This trust was executed by the statute of uses. The second act recites that the city has received and paid for a patent. It is argued that the words in the first act, "to be held and used for a burial place for said city and vicinity," show a trust more extensive than the city, and therefore prevent the execution of the use. But these words are not in the patent, and, if they had any effect, only would impose a trust upon the city; they would not prevent the operation of the habendum in the deed. It is suggested that the answer admits that the title was in the mayor until the conveyance by the city. But this is a mere conclusion of law. The answer sets up the facts in full, and it is apparent that no point was made on the pleadings below. On the contrary, it is said, and is not denied, that after a decision to that effect on de-[58] murrer * (25 C. C. A. 97, 49 U. S. App. 126, 79 Fed. 577), it was admitted by the plaintiff that the legal title vested in the city by virtue of the patent of the United States.

If the legal title was in the city, it was an absolute title. In view of the extreme unwillingness of courts to admit the existence of a common-law condition, even when the word "condition" is used, it needs no argument to show that there was no condition or limitation here. Stuart v. Easton, 170 U. S. 383, 42 L. ed. 1078, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 650. Little more needs to be said to show that the act of Congress did not make the land inalienable at common law. We need not consider whether the act could have that effect upon land within a state, when the conveyance was absolute, and was made to a citizen or instrumentality of the state; we express no opinion upon the point. It is enough that it did not purport so to restrict the ordinary incidents of title. We should require the clearest expression of such an unusual restriction before we should admit that it was imposed,—especially in an ordinary sale for cash. Here, the act probably meant no more than to explain the motive for a sale at a minimum price. Mahoning County v. Young, 8 C. C. A. 27, 16 U. S. App. 253, 59 Fed. 96. The ratified patent said nothing of any restriction, or even any trust beyond the one executed in the city. Of course, however, no question of trust is before us. If the city had found it more convenient to convey the land to a cemetery corporation, there is nothing in the statutes or patent which would have prevented it. The conveyance to the bishop was essentially similar to the case supposed, except in technical form, and probably was made on grounds of justice that very possibly were considered by Congress. The Catholics had spent money on the land, and had used it for a burial ground long before Congress passed the act.

If the city got a fee simple absolute, as in our opinion it did, we are not called upon to spend time on the question of its power under the laws of the state, or of its action in the premises. These questions were not much argued here. The city had a general power of alienation by charter, and we are not *prepared to say that the power did [59] not extend to burying grounds. The vote to adopt the report was a sufficient vote to sell, and the question is not open whether there was any informality in the execution of the sale by the mayor rather than by a special commissioner. The supposed error would be corrected by equity if necessary. After the price had been received by the city, and the land had been occupied by purchasers for nearly twenty years, the city would not now be allowed to profit by a merely technical mistake.

The objection that the deed did not follow the authority is unfounded. Giving Machebœuf a wrong title had no effect on the grant; and the habendum properly was to him and his heirs, notwithstanding the petition, and the intent that the title should follow the office and not the blood of the grantee. Apart from statute, the law does not recognize the bishop as a corporation sole, and, therefore, the land could not be limited to him and his successors. At all events, it was sufficient to give the bishop a fee by the proper words, and to leave the official succession to the title to be effected by other means than the limitation in the deed. The petition of Machebœuf no doubt contemplated that he would take the land for the benefit of his church, and no doubt he did so in fact. But there was nothing which required this intention to be expressed in the deed. The plaintiff is not concerned with the extent of Machebœuf's power to convey to secular uses.

Judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.

habeas corpus. The respondent is the warden of the state prison of the state of California, at San Quentin, and holds the petitioner in custody under a judgment of the superior court of San Luis Obispo county, state of California, in which court he had been indicted, tried, and found guilty of the crime of murder, and sentenced to be hanged.

The petition under review is the second presented to the circuit court. The first was denied on the ground "that application for relief on behalf of said Burt Ross should first be made to the courts of the state." Thereupon a petition was presented to the supreme court of the state of California, and denied. A writ of error to this court was also denied. The ground of the petition is that the grand jury by which the indictment was found was not selected in accordance with law, and that, therefore, his conviction, sentence, and commitment do not constitute due process of law, and that he is deprived of his liberty in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

By the Constitution of the state of California no person can be held for a crime unless on information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or an indictment by a grand jury. Const. 1879, § 8. By §§ 204 to 211, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state (prior to the amendments hereinafter stated), it was made the duty of each of the superior courts of the state to fix, by order, the number of grand jurors and trial jurors required for the transaction of business and the trial of causes during the ensuing year; and it was made the duty of the boards of supervisors of the counties, upon the making of said order, to select from the last preceding assessment roll a list of persons competent and suitable to serve as grand jurors, and also a list of persons to serve as trial jurors, and certify said lists, and place the same with the county clerk, who, upon receiving them, was required to file them in his office, "and write down the names contained thereon, on separate pieces of paper, of the same size and appearance, and fold each piece so as to conceal the name thereon," and "deposit the pieces of paper having on them the names of the persons selected to serve as grand jurors in a box to be called the 'grand jury box,' and those having on them the names of persons selected to serve as trial jurors in a box to be called the 'trial jury box.'" Grand jurors and trial jurors were required to be drawn respectively from these boxes, by lot, by the clerk, in the presence and by order of the court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 241, 242.

[62] On March 23, 1893, the legislature passed an act entitled "An Act to Amend Sections 204, 205, 206, and 208 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Cal. Stat. 1893, p. 297. By this act, it was provided that the superior court, after making the order stating the number of grand jurors which in its opinion would be required for the business of the court, "shall select and list the grand jurors required by said order to serve as grand jurors in said superior court during the ensuing year." It was left the duty of the board of supervisors to select a list of trial jurors. The grand jury which indicted the petitioner was selected under this act. Illegally selected, it is contended, because "it is the law of the state of California that an act with only such a title" is void under the Constitution of the state, and that, therefore, the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, the substance of which we have given above, remained the law of the state. For this contention petitioner relies on Lewis v. Dunne, 134 Cal. 291, 55 L. R. A. 833, 66 Pac. 478.

The title of the act passed upon in that case is as follows: "An Act to Revise the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California by Amending Certain Sections, Repealing Others, and Adding Certain New Sections." The act was held void under that section of the Constitution of the state which provides that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. . . . No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but, in such case, the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended." The decision was rendered upon a petition for mandamus to a judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, but what action to command does not appear. The petitioner, however, contended that both the title and body of the act showed that the act was intended to be, and was, a revision of the Code, and therefore invalid, because the law revised was not "re-enacted and published at length as revised." The court said it could see no sufficient answer to the contention. That contention is not made in the case at bar. The act of 1893 re-enacted and published at length the sections amended, and is confined to their amendment. But the act passed upon in [63] Lewis v. Dunne was also held void because its title did not express its subject,—nor, indeed, any subject. "It is apparent," the court said, "that the language of the title of the act in question, in and of itself, expresses no subject whatever." The words "in and of itself" were used to distinguish an expression of the subject by "reference," and the reference, it was said, was really not to the title of any former act; it was merely to "the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California." It was asked: "Now, what is the Code of Civil Procedure? It is merely a name given to a large part of the general laws of the state. The part of the great body of our laws which is to be found under that name is not confined to any particular subject or subjects, but includes substantive law, criminal law, and legislation that might be properly classed under any category whatever, as well as 'civil procedure.'" The reference, therefore, was not to one subject, but to many; and the revising act dealt, the court said, "with a vast variety of subjects," many of which were "totally distinct from each other;" and many of them had "no relation to civil procedure, while others were partly procedure and partly substantive law,—declaration as to personal and property rights." These observations are certainly not applicable to the act of 1893. That amends §§ 204, 205, 206, and 208 by designating them, and re-enacts and publishes them at length. It has but one purpose and contains but one subject. It amends particular sections; it does not revise a whole code.

In People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Parvin, 74 Cal. 549, 16 Pac. 490, an act was considered with the following title: "An Act to Amend Section 3481 of the Political Code." The case was not unqualifiedly approved in Lewis v. Dunne. It was not, however, overruled, and it seems to be an irresistible conclusion from the action of the supreme court of the state in denying the application of petitioner, that the act of 1893 was not ruled by Lewis v. Dunne, and was not void under the Constitution of the state. We accept the conclusion. It has support, if it need any, in Beach v. Von Detten, *decided [64] by the supreme court of California, June 26, 1903 (73 Pac. 187), where it was held (we quote from the syllabus) that "the title of an amendatory act which gives the title of the original act in full, and the number of the section in its amended form, is sufficient." People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Parvin, 74 Cal. 549, 16 Pac. 490, was cited, and it was observed that that case was discussed in Lewis v. Dunne, "and distinguished, but not overruled." And it was also observed that the Parvin Case had been approved in Francais v. Soms, 92 Cal. 503, 28 Pac. 592.

Order affirmed. Mandate forthwith.

CHOCTAW, OKLAHOMA, & GULF RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

LAURA LOUISE McDADE, Lucy W. McDade, and Kinney McDade, Defts. in Err.

Railroads—negligence—province of court and jury—overhanging waterspout—assumption of risk—appeal—general exceptions—evidence of changed conditions.

1. The question whether a railroad brakeman was killed as a result of a collision with an overhanging waterspout on a water tank is for the jury, where there was evidence that when last seen he was signaling the engineer from his post on a car of more than average height and width, where he would be likely to be struck by the spout in passing, and that shortly thereafter he was missed from the train, his lantern found on the car, and his body discovered about 675 feet beyond the tank, with injuries which might have been produced by a collision with the obstruction.
2. It is negligence as matter of law for a railroad company to maintain an iron spout so attached to a water tank as to be a constant menace to the lives and limbs of brakemen on its trains, where it might readily have been so constructed and hung as to be safe.
3. An employee assumes the risk of injury from defective appliances furnished by his employer only when the defect is known to, or plainly observable by, the employee.
4. Assignments of error as to the admission of testimony are not reviewable on writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States when based upon exceptions general in their character.
5. The admission of testimony, in an action to recover damages for the death of a railroad brakeman, alleged to be the result of a collision with an overhanging waterspout, that such spout was so reconstructed after the accident as to be farther removed from passing trains, is not error, where the jury are told that such change had no other bearing upon the issues involved than to test the correctness of the measurements offered in evidence by the railroad company to show that the waterspout did not constitute danger to brakemen on passing trains.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. McLoud submitted the cause for plaintiff in error. Messrs. George B. Peters, E. E. Wright, and C. M. Bryan were with him on the brief:

It is the duty of the trial judge to withdraw the case from the jury and direct a verdict, where the evidence is undisputed, or is of such conclusive character that the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, would be compelled to set aside a verdict returned in opposition to it.

In personal-injury cases it is only where all reasonable men would agree that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a verdict that the court is justified in withdrawing the case from the jury.

Laclede Fire-Brick Mfg. Co. v. Hartford Steam-Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. 9 C. C. A. 12, 19 U. S. App. 510, 60 Fed. 351.

In an action to recover damages for any injury arising from the defendant's neglect, the burden of showing neglect is upon the plaintiff; and, if the evidence shows that the injury resulted from one of two causes, only one of which was due to the defendant's negligence, and the inference that the injury resulted from the one cause is no stronger than that it resulted from the other, the plaintiff has failed to make out his case, and it is not competent for the court to leave the question to the jury.

Where the plaintiff himself so far contributed to the misfortune by his own negligence or want of ordinary care and caution that but for such negligence or want of care and caution on his part the misfortune would not have happened, he cannot recover.

Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. ed. 506.

Prior negligence could not be in any case inferred from subsequent changes or improvements.

If such is the tendency of this character of evidence, a sense of fairness toward the defendant in certain cases demands the exclusion of all mention of subsequent repairs for what purpose soever it may be introduced.

On the question of assumed risk, the circuit court went further in its charge in favor of the plaintiff in error than the law warranted.

The dangers which needlessly imperil human life, and which can be removed at little cost, are not those necessarily incident to the operation of a railroad, but are those which it is the duty of the railroad to remove; and, as long as the needless peril is maintained, the employer is guilty of culpable negligence.

Dorsey v. Phillips & C. Constr. Co. 42 Wis. 583.

Where the injury results in instant death, the law, out of regard to the instinct of self-preservation, presumes that the deceased was at the time in the exercise of due care; and this presumption is not overthrown by the mere fact of injury. The burden rests upon the defendant to rebut this presumption.

Even if the deceased had actually known that this spout was hanging in a dangerous position, but forgot this fact while absorbed in the discharge of his duties, it would still be for the jury to say whether, under all the circumstances, he was guilty of contributory negligence.

There are a number of well-recognized exceptions to the general rule, that evidence of subsequent precautions and repairs is not admissible; as, for instance, where it directly tends to show conditions existing at the time of the injuries, or is in rebuttal of the testimony of defendant's witnesses, or properly drawn out in their cross-examination.

Dillon v. Raleigh, 124 N. C. 184, 32 S. E. 548.

*Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of [65] the court:

This was an action to recover for the death, by wrongful act, of John I. McDade, an employee of the Choctaw, Oklahoma, & Gulf Railroad Company. The plaintiff recovered a judgment in the circuit court, which was affirmed in the court of appeals. 50 C. C. A. 591, 112 Fed. 888.

There was evidence tending to show that McDade, a brakeman in the employ of the company, was killed on the night of August 19, 1900, while engaged in the discharge of his duties as head brakeman on a car in one of the company's trains. McDade was at his post of duty, and, when last seen, was transmitting a signal from the conductor to the engineer to run past the station of Goodwin, Arkansas, which the train was then approaching. The train passed Goodwin at a rate of from 20 to 25 miles an hour. At Goodwin there was a water tank, having attached thereto an iron spout, which, when not in use, hung at an angle from the side of the tank. Shortly after passing Goodwin, McDade was missed from the train, and, upon search being instituted, his lantern was found near the place on the car where he was at the time of giving the signal. His body was found at a distance of about six hundred and seventy-five feet beyond the Goodwin tank. There was also testimony tending to show, from the location of the waterspout and the injuries upon the head and person of McDade, that he was killed as a result of being struck by the overhanging spout. The car upon which McDade was engaged at the time of the injury was a furniture car, wider and higher than the average car, and of such size as to make it highly dangerous to be on top of it at the place it was necessary to be when giving signals, in view of the fact that the spout cleared the car by less than the height of a man above the car when in position to perform the duties required of him.

There was no eyewitness as to the exact manner of the injury to McDade, and it is urged that the court below should have taken the case from the jury because of the lack of testimony *upon this point. It was [66] left to the jury under proper instructions to find whether McDade came to his death in the manner stated in the declaration, and the court distinctly charged that, unless satisfied of this, there could be no verdict against the railroad company. While the evidence was circumstantial, it was ample, in our opinion, to warrant the submission of this question to the jury under the instructions given. Furniture cars like the one on which McDade was riding were received and transported over this road. There is testimony tending to show that a proper construction of the tank and appliances required the spout to hang vertically when not in use, and other testimony to the effect that, when hung in this manner, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the fireman to pull down the spout in taking water, and that to hang it at an angle is, at least, a more convenient method of adjustment. Be this as it may, the testimony makes it clear that in the proper construction of this appliance there is no necessity of bringing it so near to the car as to endanger brakemen working thereon. Whether hung at an angle or not, it can be so constructed as to leave such space between it and the top of the car as to make it entirely safe for brakemen in passing. The testimony makes it equally clear that, when on the furniture car, McDade, sitting at his post, would be likely to be struck by the spout in passing. It is undoubtedly true that many duties required of employees in the transaction of the business to be carried on by a railroad company are necessarily attended with danger, and can only be prosecuted by means which are hazardous and dangerous to those who see fit to enter into such employment. Where no necessity exists, as in the present case, for the use of dangerous appliances, and where it is a matter requiring only due skill and care to make the appliances safe, there is no reason why an employee should be subjected to dangers wholly unnecessary to the proper operation of the business of the employer. Kelleher v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 80 Wis. 584, 50 N. W. 942; Georgia P. R. Co. v. Davis, 92 Ala. 300, 9 So. 252;

[67] 1 Shearm. & *Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 201, and cases cited.

We agree with the circuit court of appeals in affirming the instructions upon this subject given by Judge Hammond to the jury, in which he said: "It is so simple a task, one so devoid of all exigencies of expense, necessity, or convenience, so free of any consideration of skill, except that of the foot rule, and so entirely destitute of any element of choice or selection, that not to make such a construction safe for the brakemen on the trains is a conviction of negligence."

It is the duty of a railroad company to use due care to provide a reasonably safe place and safe appliances for the use of workmen in its employ. It is obliged to use ordinary care to provide properly constructed roadbed, structures, and track to be used in the operation of the road. Union P.

R. Co. v. O'Brien, 161 U. S. 451, 40 L. ed. 766, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618. The spout might readily have been so constructed and hung as to be safe. As it was maintained, it was a constant menace to the lives and limbs of employees whose duties required them, by night and day, to pass the structure. It is a case where the dangerous structure is not justified by the necessity of the situation, and we agree with the judgments in the courts below that its maintenance under the circumstances was negligence upon the part of the railroad company. The court, having left to the jury to find the fact as to whether McDade was killed by the obstruction, did not err in giving instruction that the negligent manner in which the waterspout was maintained was, of itself, a conviction of negligence.

The court left to the jury the question of the assumption of risk upon the part of McDade, with instructions which did not permit of recovery if he either knew of the danger of collision with the waterspout, or, by the observance of ordinary care upon his part, ought to have known of it. The servant assumes the risk of dangers incident to the business of the master, but not of the latter's negligence. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612; Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 932; Northern P. R.* [68] Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590; Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 958, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 978. The question of assumption of risk is quite apart from that of contributory negligence. The servant has the right to assume that the master has used due diligence to provide suitable appliances in the operation of his business, and he does not assume the risk of the employer's negligence in performing such duties. The employee is not obliged to pass judgment upon the employer's methods of transacting his business, but may assume that reasonable care will be used in furnishing the appliances necessary for its operation. This rule is subject to the exception that where a defect is known to the employee, or is so patent as to be readily observed by him, he cannot continue to use the defective apparatus in the face of knowledge and without objection, without assuming the hazard incident to such a situation. In other words, if he knows of a defect, or it is so plainly observable that he may be presumed to know of it, and continues in the master's employ without objection, he is taken to have made his election to continue in the employ of the master, notwithstanding the defect, and, in such case, cannot recover. The charge of the court upon the assumption of risk was more favorable to the plaintiff in error than the law required, as it exonerated the railroad company from fault if, in the exercise of ordinary care, McDade might have discovered the danger. Upon this question the true test is not in the exercise of care to discover dangers, but whether the defect is known or plainly observable by the employee. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Archibald, 170 U. S. 665, 42 L. ed. 1188, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 777.

There was testimony tending to show that McDade had been over the part of the road where the Goodwin tank was situated only a few times, and that part of the trips were made in the night season, and also, that the furniture cars were of unusual height as compared with those generally used in the transaction of the business of the company. Neither the assumption of risk nor the contributory negligence of the plaintiff below was so plainly evident as to require the jury [69] to be instructed *to find against the plaintiff, but, under the facts disclosed, these matters were properly left to the determination of the jury.

Numerous exceptions were taken to the refusal of the court to charge in certain respects, but, as the charge given was proper and pertinent to the facts and sufficiently comprehensive, it was not error to refuse such requests. The assignments of error as to the admission of testimony were nearly all based upon exceptions, general in their character, and, under the well-settled rule, not reviewable here. Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 125, 22 L. ed. 299; Noonan v. Caldonia Min. Co. 121 U. S. 400, 30 L. ed. 1063, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 911; District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 136 U. S. 462, 34 L. ed. 476, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 990.

The one of most gravity is as to the admission of testimony to show that after the accident the waterspout at Goodwin was reconstructed so as to be placed at a point farther removed from passing trains. Evidence having been introduced by the railroad company to show by measurements that the waterspout did not constitute danger to brakemen on passing trains, the court permitted plaintiff below to show that changes had been made which might have an effect upon the subsequent measurements offered in evidence. The jury were told that nothing could be inferred against the defendant company by reason of the fact that, after the accident, such reconstruction of the spout was made, and that such change had no other bearing upon the issues of the case than to enable the jury to ascertain the value of the measurements offered in evidence.

We find no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, and it is affirmed.

CAMPBELLVILLE LUMBER COMPANY.

Bonds—of county—remedies for collection.

The omission from county bonds purporting to be issued under the authority of Ky. act of March 18, 1878, of the stipulation respecting the remedies for collection which was required to appear on their face by the amendatory act of February 27, 1882, coupled with their failure to contain any reference to the later statute, deprives the holder of the extraordinary remedies for collection not provided for by the original, and only granted in the amendatory, act.

Argued October 20, 1903. Decided November 9, 1903.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, awarding to the holder of county bonds the benefit of the extraordinary remedies for collection granted by a statute amending the act under which the bonds purported to be issued. Affirmed.

See same case below, 50 C. C. A. 435, 112 Fed. 718.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On March 18, 1878, the general assembly of Kentucky passed an act authorizing the county of Taylor to compromise its debts and issue new bonds of the county not exceeding in amount $125,000, and also authorizing the circuit court, in case of a judgment on any of such bonds and a refusal by the county within thirty days to levy a tax sufficient to pay it, to make an order based on the last previous assessment, levying a tax and appointing a collector. On February 27, 1882, an amendatory act was passed increasing the issuable amount to $150,000, providing that any judgment rendered thereon should constitute a lien on all the real and personal property in the county subject to taxation, and also that, if the court rendering the judgment should be of opinion that such serious obstruction was likely to be offered as would materially delay the enforcement of the judgment, it should refer the matter to a commissioner, with instructions to ascertain and report the amount proportionally necessary for the holders or owners of any such property to pay in order to raise *promptly a sum sufficient to pay the judgment. Personal judgments were authorized against the parties found to be the owners of property within the limits of the county, to be enforced by executions as other personal judgments. Section 10 reads as follows:

"Sec. 10. The bonds to be issued under the act to which this is an amendment shall, on their face, stipulate that the holders of any of them, or any coupon thereof, shall be entitled to the remedies for the collection of the same herein, and in the act to which this is an amendment, provided for."

Bonds were issued by the county, some of which passed into the possession of the plaintiff, who brought suit and obtained judgment against the county in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky.

The bonds did not contain the stipulation referred to in § 10, but did contain the following recital:

"This is one of an issue amounting in all to $125,000, authorized by an act of the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky, approved March 18, 1878."

Each bond also bore the following indorsement:

"Issued by authority of an act of the general assembly of the state of Kentucky, approved March 18, 1878."

On application for further relief the circuit court awarded to the plaintiff the benefit of the special provisions of the amendatory act of 1882, but the circuit court of appeals held that he was not entitled to them. 50 C. C. A. 435, 112 Fed. 718. Thereupon the case was brought here on certiorari. 186 U. S. 485, 46 L. ed. 1260, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 856.

Mr. W. O. Harris argued the cause and filed a brief for petitioner:

When the requisitions prescribed are intended for the protection of the citizen and to prevent a sacrifice of his property, and by a disregard of which his rights might be, and generally would be, injuriously affected, they are not directory, but mandatory.

A statute is mandatory if its literal observance might afford substantial protection to the party complaining.

The remedy afforded by the act was a part of the contract, and was beyond the reach of repeal.

Mr. Ernest Macpherson argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent:

The purchaser of municipal securities is bound by the statute therein recited, and may not invoke the aid of another statute not referred to in his bond without bringing himself within its terms.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Conceding, without deciding, that both acts of the general assembly of Kentucky were in all respects constitutional and valid, and that the proceedings of the circuit court were in strict compliance therewith, we notice only the single question of the effect of the omission from the bonds of the stipulation required by § 10, as well as of any reference to the amendatory act, and are of opinion that the omission is fatal to the special relief provided for in that act.

There is nothing in the nature of things nor in the terms of the two acts which prevents the parties—the county and the recipient of the bonds—from contracting for solely the remedies provided in the original act. The later act provided remedies not in lieu of, but in addition to, those given by the former. There is nothing on the face of the bonds to indicate that either of the parties had in contemplation the provisions of the amendatory act. On the contrary, the bonds in terms state that they are of an issue amounting to $125,000, authorized by the original act. As the amendatory act authorized the issue of $150,000, and as no reference is made to that act, the language of the bond plainly excludes it as *the basis of [76] authority, and therefore as plainly implies that the remedies by that act were not contracted for by the county.

We need not stop to inquire what would be the effect of a recital on the face of the bonds that they were issued under the authority of the amendatory act, or whether such recital would obviate the necessity of complying with the provisions of § 10, for there is no reference to such act, and the bonds on their face do not purport to be issued under its authority. So that the question is whether the plaintiff, in the absence of any such stipulation as is required by § 10, without any reference in the bonds to the amendatory act, and when they purport to be issued under the authority of the original act, can avail himself of the remedies not provided for by the original, and only granted in the amendatory, act.

Much is said in the opinion of the court of appeals as well as in the briefs of counsel as to the difference between a directory and a mandatory provision,—the plaintiff claiming that § 10 is simply directory, while the defendant insists that it is mandatory. In that opinion these authorities are cited:

“By directory provisions,” says Judge Cooley, “is meant that they are to be considered as giving directions which ought to be followed, but not so limiting the power in respect to which the directions are given that it cannot be effectually exercised without observing them.” Cooley, Const. Lim. *74.

“Lord Penzance, in Howard v. Bodington, L. R. 2. P. Div. 211, after commenting on the difficulty of gathering any rule from the cases, said: ‘I believe, as far as any rule is concerned, you cannot safely go further than that in each case you must look to the subject matter; consider the importance of the provision that has been disregarded, and the relation of that provision to the general object intended to be secured by the act, and upon a review of the case in that aspect decide whether the enactment is what is called “imperative” or “directory.”’”

Without attempting to state any general [77] rule, if indeed one *such exists, for distinguishing between a directory and a mandatory provision, it is sufficient to say that when a statute provides an extraordinary remedy to the holder of bonds containing an express stipulation that he “shall be entitled” to that remedy, it should not be adjudged that he is also entitled to it in the absence of such stipulation, for it is a reasonable presumption that if the county, in issuing the bonds, intended to contract for such extraordinary remedy, it would have complied with the express provision of the statute, and incorporated the stipulation into the bonds. That the authority in this amendatory act to proceed directly against the several owners of property in the county is not an ordinary remedy for the collection of bonds is true of the state of Kentucky and generally of the states of the Union. Indeed, the original act gave something more than the ordinary remedy, and when the amendatory act provides for what must be conceded is, under the circumstances, an extraordinary remedy, it would seem reasonable to hold that all of the provisions of the statute which grant such remedy should be complied with before it can be considered as contracted for.

We are of opinion that the Court of Appeals did not err, and its judgment is affirmed.

Removal of causes—diverse citizenship—amendment of petition.

Leave to amend a petition for removal to a Federal court for diverse citizenship so as to show the citizenship of the plaintiffs may, in the exercise of the general power of Federal courts, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 948, 954 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 695, 696), to allow amendments of process, be granted after the filing of the removal papers, but before any action taken in the Federal court on the merits, where there was a general averment of diverse citizenship, and the citizenship of defendant had been clearly stated, and it appeared from the face of the trust deed, which was the subject-matter in controversy, that the plaintiffs were, at the time of its execution, residents of another state.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Utah to review a decree for defendant in a suit which had been removed to that court from the District Court of Salt Lake County. Affirmed.

See same case below, 113 Fed. 359.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On August 25, 1899, appellants commenced this suit in the district court of Salt Lake county, Utah. By it plaintiffs sought an accounting and the cancelation of a deed of trust executed by them to a trustee for the benefit of the defendant. The complaint alleged that "the defendant was and now is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Colorado." The deed of trust (copied in the complaint) was executed November 22, 1890, and purports to be "between Antoinette B. Kinney and Clesson S. Kinney, her husband, of the county of Salt Lake and territory of Utah, parties of the first part; and Clyde J. Eastman" named as trustee. It was executed before a notary public in Salt Lake county.

On September 2, 1899, the defendant filed a petition and bond for removal to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Utah. That petition alleged:

"Your petitioner, The Columbia Savings & Loan Association, respectfully shows to this honorable court that the matter and amount in dispute in the above-entitled suit exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2000.

[79] *"That the controversy in said suit is between citizens of different states, and that your petitioner, the defendant in the above-entitled suit, was, at the time of the commencement of the suit, and still is, a resident and a citizen of the city of Denver and state of Colorado."

On November 28, 1899, the plaintiffs filed a motion to remand the cause to the state court on the ground, that "the amount or matter in dispute therein does not, and at the time said cause was removed from the state court, did not, exceed the sum or value of $2,000, exclusive of interest and cost." On the same day the defendant filed in the circuit court an answer and cross complaint, by the latter seeking a foreclosure of the trust deed. In the cross complaint it alleged "that it is a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of Colorado, and is a citizen of said state, and that complainants herein are citizens and residents of Salt Lake City, state of Utah."

On December 30, 1899, the plaintiffs gave notice of a motion to amend their motion to remand, by adding as a further ground "that the diverse citizenship of the parties at the time of the commencement of the suit, and at the time of the removal of said cause from the state court, does not appear upon the record."

On January 2, 1900, the defendant gave notice of a motion to amend the paragraph heretofore quoted from its cross complaint to read as follows:

"First. That your orator, at the time of the commencement of this suit, was and ever since then, and now is, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Colorado, and a citizen and resident of the city of Denver and state of Colorado, and that the said plaintiffs, Antoinette B. Kinney and Clesson S. Kinney, at the time of the commencement of this suit, were, and ever since have been, and still are, citizens of the state of Utah, and residents thereof, residing at the city of Salt Lake in the said state of Utah."

*And also notice of a motion to amend [80] the petition for removal by adding this allegation:

"That the plaintiffs, Antoinette B. Kinney and Clesson S. Kinney, and each of them, were at the time of the commencement of this suit, and still are, citizens and residents of the city of Salt Lake and state of Utah."

On January 6, 1900, the motion to remand was denied, and leave given to amend the petition for removal and the cross complaint. Subsequently the case went to trial in the circuit court, and a decree was rendered in favor of the defendant for the recovery of $4,003.45, and the foreclosure of the trust deed. From such decree an appeal was allowed to this court upon the single question of jurisdiction.

Messrs. Charles S. Varian and Franklin S. Richards submitted the cause for appellants:

Amendments may be allowed by the circuit court when, and when only, the petition for removal, as presented to the state court, upon its face, in connection with the remainder of the record made at that time, shows sufficient ground for removal.

S. 691, 38 L. ed. 318, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533; Powers v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 169 U. S. 101, 42 L. ed. 676, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264.

Mr. J. Norman submitted the cause for appellee:

The petition having been founded upon the diversity of the citizenship of plaintiffs and defendant, and that fact being stated, sufficient was averred to give the Federal court jurisdiction, and to authorize an amendment to supply the formal and particular averments as to the citizenship of the plaintiffs.

Stadleman v. White Line Towing Co. 92 Fed. 209; Johnson v. F. C. Austin Mfg. Co. 76 Fed. 616.

If, upon the face of the petition and the whole record of the state court, sufficient grounds for removal are shown, the petition may be amended in the circuit court of the United States by leave of that court by stating more fully and distinctly the facts which support those grounds.

Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421, 30 L. ed. 992, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030; Martin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 151 U. S. 673, 38 L. ed.

311, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533; Powers v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 169 U. S. 92, 42 L. ed. 673, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264.

And where the removal is upon a single ground, e. g., diverse citizenship, the right of amendment goes for nothing, unless a necessary and material fact not appearing in the record may be supplied.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Had the Federal court the power to permit the amendment of the petition for removal? The suit was removable. Diverse citizenship in fact existed and the amount in controversy was over $2,000. The right to remove existed, but the petition for removal was defective. If it had been sufficient there would have been no need of amendment. The question is whether it was so defective as to be incurable. In other words, was the case one in which the court had power to permit the facts to be stated in order to secure to the defendant the removal to which it had a right? By § 1 of chap. 866 (25 Stat. at L. 434, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 508, 582), jurisdiction is given to the circuit courts of all suits of a civil nature "where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000," and "in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states." By § 2 of the same act any such suit pending in a state court may be removed into the circuit court of the United [81] States by the defendant or defendants "if nonresidents. The petition for removal, which was duly verified, alleged the existence of just such a suit. True, this court, construing the statute, has held that the difference of citizenship must exist both at the commencement of the suit and at the filing of the petition for removal. Gibson v. Bruce, 108 U. S. 561, 27 L. ed. 825, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 873; Akers v. Akers, 117 U. S. 197, 29 L. ed. 888, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 669; Stevens v. Nichols, 130 U. S. 230, 32 L. ed. 914, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518. But this does not change the fact that the language of the petition follows that of the statute in stating the existence of that which the statute makes the basis of a right of removal.

It is also true that when a record presented to this court fails to show a diversity of citizenship, both when the suit was commenced and when the petition for removal was filed, a reversal has been ordered and the case sent back to the circuit court, with directions to remand to the state court. Stevens v. Nichols, 130 U. S. 230, 32 L. ed. 914, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518; Orchore v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 131 U. S. 240, 33 L. ed. 144, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 692; Jackson v. Allen, 132 U. S. 27, 33 L. ed. 249, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9; La 191 U. S.

Confiance Compagnie d'Assurance Contre l'Incendie v. Hall, 137 U. S. 61, 34 L. ed. 573, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 5; Kellam v. Keith, 144 U. S. 568, 36 L. ed. 544, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922; Mattingly v. Northwestern Virginia R. Co. 158 U. S. 53, 39 L. ed. 894, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 725. In none of these cases does it appear that the defect was noticed in the circuit court, and in some not noticed by the parties after the case had reached this court, but action was taken here by virtue of the duty resting on all Federal courts not to entertain jurisdiction if it does not affirmatively appear. It is also true that in Orchore v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 33 L. ed. 144, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 692, this court was asked to grant leave to the circuit court to permit an amendment of the defective removal proceedings, and the application was denied, but that was after the case had been finally disposed of in the circuit court, and the insufficiency of the removal papers had been declared by this. Here the application was made shortly after the filing of the removal papers, and before any action had been taken in the circuit court. The amendment was allowed by the circuit court, and the question now to determine is whether that court had power to permit such amendment. It is frequently stated that amendments are within the discretion of the trial court, and that, unless it appears that the discretion has been abused, no error is shown.

*A petition and bond for removal are in [82] the nature of process. They constitute the process by which the case is transferred from the state to the Federal court. Congress has made ample provision for the amendment of process. Section 948 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 695), reads:

"Any circuit or district court may at any time, in its discretion, and upon such terms as it may deem just, allow an amendment of any process returnable to or before it, where the defect has not prejudiced, and the amendment will not injure, the party against whom such process issues."

And by § 954 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 695), it is provided that—

"No summons, writ, declaration, return, process, judgment, or other proceedings in civil causes, in any court of the United States, shall be abated, arrested, quashed, or reversed for any defect or want of form, . . . and may at any time permit either of the parties to amend any defect in the process or pleadings, upon such conditions as it shall, in its discretion and by its rules, prescribe."

The question of the power of amendment has been decided by this court in several cases. In Parker v. Overman, 18 How. 137, 15 L. ed. 318, a petition for removal was defective in that it simply alleged residence, and not citizenship, but was corrected, over objection, by amendment in the Federal court, and, as said by Mr. Justice Grier, (p. 141, L. ed. p. 319):

"In the petition to remove this case from the state court there was not a proper averment as to the citizenship of the plaintiff in error. It alleged that Parker 'resided' in Tennessee and White in Maryland. 'Citizenship' and 'residence' are not synonymous terms; but as the record was afterwards so amended as to show conclusively the citizenship of the parties, the court below had, and this court have, undoubted jurisdiction of the case."

In Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421, 30 L. ed. 992, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030, the application for removal was based on two grounds: One, diverse citizenship, and the other, the existence of a Federal question. The allegation in respect to the Federal question was general, and did not state the facts. After the case had been entered in the Federal court, an answer was filed, stating more [83] fully the facts "upon which the existence of a Federal question was based. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, said, in reference to this answer:

"The answer was filed, which, for the purposes of jurisdiction, may fairly be treated as an amendment to the petition for removal, setting forth the facts from which the conclusions there stated were drawn. As an amendment, the answer was germane to the petition, and did no more than set forth in proper form what had been imperfectly stated."

It is true that this court, on examination of the record, found that no Federal question was even then disclosed, but that does not alter the ruling that an amendment was proper showing the facts upon which the general averment of a Federal question was based. Grace v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 278, 285, 27 L. ed. 932, 935, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207, seems to recognize the right of amendment. The same may be said of Thayer v. Life Asso. of America, 112 U. S. 717, 720, 28 L. ed. 864, 866, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355. Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646, 24 L. ed. 1057, was a suit originally commenced in the United States circuit court. It failed to allege diverse citizenship, but no objection was made in the court below on that ground, and while this court reversed the judgment, it sent the case back with leave to amend the petition in respect to the allegation of citizenship. The case relied upon in the opinion was Morgan v. Gay, 19 Wall. 81, 22 L. ed. 100, in which the same ruling had been made. These cases recognize the power of the circuit court to permit amendment of pleadings to show diverse citizenship, and of removal proceedings where there is a technical defect and there are averments sufficient to show jurisdiction.

The facts here disclosed clearly show a case in which an amendment was rightfully made. The citizenship of the defendant, both at the time the suit was commenced and when the petition for removal was filed, was clearly and positively stated. There was a general averment that it was a case of diverse citizenship, and, therefore, one in which, by the statute, the party was entitled to a removal. The trust deed, which was the subject-matter of the controversy, showed upon its face that the plaintiffs were of Salt Lake county, and was executed before a notary public in that county. The continuance *of that situation is to be presumed. [84] The first action taken by the plaintiffs after the removal was a motion to remand, based not on account of any defect in the averments of citizenship, but simply in respect to the amount in controversy. A month after filing this motion they sought to amend it by including an objection on account of a defect in the allegations of diverse citizenship, and immediately thereafter the defendant moved to amend the petition for removal so as to make it sufficient in that respect. All these things took place before any action had been had in the Federal court on the merits of the case. It may also be noticed that the state court apparently recognized the removal proceedings as sufficient, for it took no further steps in the case, and hence we need not inquire what would have been the effect of any action taken by it in disregard of the removal. Clearly, the plaintiffs were not prejudiced. The case was one which the appellee had a right to remove, and nothing had been done to prejudice the rights of the plaintiffs before the petition for removal was perfected. It seems to us, therefore, that this is a case in which the amendment was properly allowed.

The decree of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err.,
v.

DENVER & RIO GRANDE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 84-93.)

Evidence—trover—prima facie case—burden of proof—error to territorial supreme court—extent of review.

1. A prima facie case on the part of the NOTE.—As to review by the United States Supreme Court of territorial decisions—see note to Miners' Bank v. Iowa, 13 L. ed. U. S. 867.

United States in an action of trover against a railroad company for the value of timber cut upon the public domain is made out by proof of the government ownership of the lands, the cutting and asportation of the timber, its value, and subsequent possession by the railroad company, although special acts of Congress exist, conferring authority on such company to take timber from the public domain for certain specified purposes.

2. The burden of proving the purpose for which timber was taken from the public domain by a lumber company acting as the agent of a railroad company rests in the first instance on the railroad company, in an action of trover brought by the United States against that company for the value of the timber, where such company relies upon the authority conferred by the acts of Congress of June 8, 1872 (17 Stat. at L. 339, chap. 354), and March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. at L. 405, chap. 126), to take from the public lands the timber required for the construction and repair of its railway and telegraph line.
3. The action of a territorial supreme court on both the first and second writs of error in a case may be revised by the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error, although the lower court considered itself bound by its decision on the first writ of error as the law of the case, where its judgment upon such writ lacked the requisite finality to warrant a review in the higher court.

Argued October 14, 1903. Decided November 9, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court in favor of defendant in an action of trover brought by the United States against a railroad company for the value of timber taken from the public domain. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

See same case below, 9 N. M. 382, 54 Pac. 241, and 66 Pac. 550.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was an action of trover brought by the United States against the railroad company for the value of certain logs cut upon the plaintiff's lands. The declaration averred simply that the "defendant converted to its own use plaintiff's goods; that is to say, logs, lumber, and timbers, . . . manufactured out of trees theretofore standing and growing upon certain lands of the plaintiff," therein described.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, issue was joined, the case tried before a jury, which was instructed to return a verdict for the defendant.

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, which showed that the New Mexico Lumber Company cut from the 191 U. S.

lands described in the declaration 2,100,000 feet of lumber, which was furnished to and received by the railroad company for its use.

Upon these facts, and proof of the ownership of the lands, and of the value of the lumber cut, the plaintiff rested.

The defendant also offered an agreed statement of facts, in which it appeared that it was the successor of the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, and that by act of Congress of June 8, 1872 (17 Stat. at L. 339, chap. 354) and amendatory act of March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. at L. 405, chap. 126), "the right of way over the public domain . . . and the right to take from the public lands adjacent thereto, stone, timber, earth, water, and other material required for the construction and repair of its railway and telegraph line," was granted to the Rio Grande Railway Company, of which the defendant was entitled to the benefit. The amendatory act of 1897 merely extended the time for the completion of the railway from five to ten years, and is not material to this controversy. Defendant also offered testimony showing the appointment of the New Mexico Lumber Company as its agent for the cutting of such timber for the purposes mentioned, and that the lumber delivered to the railroad company was furnished upon specific orders given to *the lumber company as its agents. There[86] were other facts included in the statement which are immaterial upon this writ of error.

No testimony was offered by either party tending to show whether the timber cut from the lands and received by the defendant was required for the construction and repair of its railway and telegraph line.

The jury, under instructions of the court, returned a verdict of not guilty, and judgment was entered for the defendant, which was affirmed by the supreme court. 66 Pac. 550.

The case was first tried in 1897, a verdict for plaintiffs returned, the case carried to the supreme court, which reversed the judgment of the court below upon the ground of erroneous instructions with respect to the burden of proof. 9 N. M. 382, 54 Pac. 241.

Mr. Marsden C. Burch argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff.

E. E. Bolles Wooden-ware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 27 L. ed. 230, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 398.

The court erred in holding defendant's plea sufficient to admit of a special statutory defense.

The court erred in holding that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the timber was used for purposes not contemplated by the act.

Mr. Joel F. Vaile argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Edward O. Wolcott, Charles W. Waterman, Edward L. Bartlett, and William W. Field, filed a brief for defendant:

The plea or answer of the defendant herein was at common law appropriate, regular, and sufficient to entitle defendant to raise all the issues and introduce all the evidence which were presented by it in the case at bar.

The burden was on the plaintiff below to establish affirmatively a wrongful conversion by the defendant.

When the right or license is established by the evidence, then the presumption of law is that the right has been properly and legitimately exercised, and the burden of proof is on the party asserting the contrary.

United States v. Reder, 69 Fed. 965;

United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 150 U. S. 1, 37 L. ed. 975, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 11.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

As plaintiffs alleged simply a conversion of logs, and defendant pleaded the general issue of not guilty, plaintiffs made a prima facie case by proving their ownership of the lands, the cutting and asportation of the timber, its value, and its subsequent possession by the defendant. Here they were entitled to rest, and did rest. They were under no obligation to put in the special acts of Congress, nor could defendant compel their introduction by them.

By the laws of New Mexico of 1889, certain forms of pleadings are prescribed, including forms of pleas in actions for wrongs, one of which is that the defendant "is not guilty of the wrong alleged," and another "that he did what is complained of by the defendant's" (mistake for plaintiff's) "leave."

Whether it was competent, under the plea of not guilty, to introduce the special acts of Congress in question we do not *find it [90] necessary to decide; but assuming that the defense could be made, it is clear that upon the introduction of the statute of 1872 it became necessary for the defendant to assume the burden of producing evidence tending to show that the public lands were adjacent to the right of way, and that the timbers cut were required for the construction or repair of its railway or telegraph line. This is not a question of pleading, but of the order of proof. There was a question of adjacency made in the court below which is not pressed here, and the case was argued substantially upon the question as to which party had the burden of showing the purpose for which the timber was cut.

Except in a single particular, hereinafter noticed, we think this case is practically controlled, with respect to the burden of proof, by that of the Northern P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 162 U. S. 366, 40 L. ed. 1002, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831, decided in 1896. That was an action against the railroad company for negligence in burning certain cordwood belonging to the plaintiffs. To prove ownership, plaintiffs showed that they had entered upon a portion of the unsurveyed lands of the United States, chopped about 10,000 cords from the timber thereon standing, and that after it was cut it was piled up near the railroad. For authority to cut the wood plaintiffs relied upon an act of Congress of June 3, 1878 (20 Stat. at L. 88, chap. 150, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1528), the first section of which authorized bona fide residents of the state to fell and remove, for building, agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, timber growing on the public lands, "said lands being mineral, and not subject to entry under existing laws of the United States, except for mineral entry, . . . subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe." Plaintiffs insisted that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the presumption was that when they cut the timber they complied with and came under the conditions provided for in this act, and that the burden rested upon the defendant to show that the conditions mentioned in the act had not been complied with by them. The court held that if plaintiffs had acquired the right, by reason of a compliance with the statute, the facts should have been shown by them; that the presumption [91] was that the cutting was illegal, and that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs to show the facts which brought them within the statute of 1878.

In United States v. Cook, 19 Wall. 591, 22 L. ed. 210, which was an action of replevin to recover possession of certain logs cut by Indians upon a reservation, and sold to Cook, it was held that the Indians, having only the right of occupancy, could not cut the timber for the purposes of sale, and that it was incumbent on the purchaser to show that the timber was rightfully severed from the lands.

The only feature distinguishing the case under consideration from that of Lewis is that the timber was cut, not by the defendant corporation, but by the New Mexico Lumber Company, acting as its agent, and was subsequently furnished and delivered to the defendant. It is insisted that there is a presumption that the agent, having authority to cut, acted within the scope of his authority, and that this would of itself throw upon the plaintiffs the burden of showing that it had not. Although a presumption of this kind may attach to the acts of public officers, we know of no case holding that a party sued for a conversion by his agent may shield himself under a presumption that the agent acted within the scope of his authority. If the burden of proof would rest upon the defendant to show the cutting of timber for a proper purpose, evidently it could not shift that burden upon the plaintiffs by employing an agent to do the work.

Upon principle as well as upon authority, a party who has been shown to be prima facie guilty of a trespass, and relies upon a license, must exhibit his license, and prove that his acts were justified by it. The practical injustice of a different rule is manifest. It would require the plaintiffs not only to establish a negative, that is, that the timber was not cut for the purpose of construction and repair, but to establish it by testimony peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant. As the cutting in this case was done by agents and servants of the defendant, it would impose upon the plaintiffs a difficult, if not an impossible, task, to require them to show that the timber was not cut for the construction or repair of the railway, though *evidence that it [92] was so cut could be readily produced by the defendant. It is a general rule of evidence, noticed by the elementary writers upon that subject (1 Greenl. Ev. § 79) that "where the subject-matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the averment is taken as true unless disproved by that party." When a negative is averred in pleading, or plaintiff's case depends upon the establishment of a negative, and the means of proving the fact are equally within the control of each party, then the burden of proof is upon the party averring the negative; but when the opposite party must, from the nature of the case, himself be in possession of full and plenary proof to disprove the negative averment, and the other party is not in possession of such proof, then it is manifestly just and reasonable that the party which is in possession of the proof should be required to adduce it; or, upon his failure to do so, we must presume it does not exist, which of itself establishes a negative. Great Western R. Co. v. Bacon, 30 Ill. 347, 83 Am. Dec. 199; King v. Turner, 5 Maule & S. 206. Familiar instances of this are where persons are prosecuted for doing a business, such, for instance, as selling liquor without a license. It might be extremely difficult for the prosecution in this class of cases to show that the defendant had not the license required, whereas the latter may prove it without the slightest difficulty. In such cases the law casts upon the defendant not only the burden of producing his license, but of showing that it was broad enough to authorize the acts complained of. Com. v. Rafferty, 133 Mass. 574; Com. v. Tourle, 133 Mass. 490. As the license (the statute in this case) authorized the timber to be cut only for a specific purpose, and the means of proof as to the purpose for which the timber was cut were peculiarly within the knowledge and control of the defendant, we think the burden of producing evidence to that effect devolved upon it.

This burden, however, which was simply to meet the prima facie case of the government, must not be confounded with the preponderance of evidence, the establishment of which usually rests upon the plaintiff. Heinemann v. Heard, 62 N. Y. 448; Willett* [93] v. Rich, 142 Mass. 360, 56 Am. Rep. 684, 7 N. E. 776; Wilder v. Cowles, 100 Mass. 487; Central Bridge Corp. v. Butler, 2 Gray, 130.

If this were a criminal case it would undoubtedly rest on the government upon the whole evidence to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the timber was not cut for the construction or repair of the railway.

While the supreme court of New Mexico upon this second writ of error may have considered itself bound by its decision upon the question here involved upon the first writ as the law of the case, we are not ourselves restrained by the same limitation. As its judgment upon the first writ was merely for a reversal of the court below, and for a new trial, such judgment, not being final, could not be made the subject of a writ of error from this court. Upon the present writ, however, we are at liberty to revise the action of the court below in both instances.

There was error in requiring plaintiffs to assume the burden of showing that the timber was not cut for purposes of construction or repair, and the judgment of the Supreme Court is therefore reversed, and the case remanded to that court with instructions to order a new trial.

Prohibition—will not issue after cause is ended.

Prohibition against the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court to prevent the giving of further effect to a judgment annulling a decree of a Federal court in the Indian territory, admitting persons to citizenship in those nations, or the certifying and delivering of a copy of such judgment to the Dawes commission, on the ground that the provisions of the act of Congress of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. at L. 641, chap. 1362) § 31, authorizing in a test case the proceedings upon which the judgment rests, are unconstitutional,—will not issue, where the citizenship court, before the application for prohibition was heard, had rendered its judgment, and certified the same to the commission, which was all that it was empowered by the statute in question to do.

PETITION for prohibition, and certiorari in aid thereof, to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Citizenship Court, to prevent the giving of further effect to a decree annulling a decree of a Federal court in the Indian territory, admitting certain persons to citizenship in those nations, or the certifying and delivering of a copy of such decree to the Dawes commission. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Calvin L. Herbert argued the cause, and, with Mr. William I. Cruce, filed a brief for petitioner.

Mr. George A. Mansfield argued the cause, and, with Messrs. John F. McMurray and Melven Cornish, filed a brief for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

Solicitor General Hoyt submitted the cause for the United States.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of prohibition, and for a writ of certiorari in aid of the same, to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court, established by an agreement between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, made on March 21, 1902, and ratified by an act of Congress of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. at L. 641, chap. 1362). By § 31 of the act the two nations were authorized to file a bill in equity in the said court to annul, on certain grounds of law, decrees of United States courts in the Indian territory, whereby certain persons were admitted to citizenship in those nations. The bill was filed and a decree was made purporting to annul the former decrees. The prohibition sought is against giving further effect to this decree, or certifying and delivering a copy of the same to the Dawes commission, established under an earlier act, it being alleged that the provisions of § 31 are contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

The facts alleged and not denied may be summed up as follows: *By the act of June [100] 10, 1896, chap. 398 (29 Stat. at L. 321, 339), Congress authorized a commission to the five civilized tribes of Indians, commonly called the Dawes commission, to hear and determine the rights of persons claiming citizenship in any of those nations, with an appeal to the United States courts in the territory. The petitioner applied to the commission, and, his application being rejected, appealed to the United States court, and there, on March 8, 1898, got a decree in his favor, declaring him to be a member of the Chickasaw Nation. A bill of review brought by the Chickasaw Nation is pending in the United States court of appeals for the Indian territory. After the decree, and before the act of 1902, and, for anything to the contrary in the petition, before the decision of this court next to be mentioned, the petitioner entered a tract of Chickasaw land, and made improvements costing $15,000. For this he invokes the act of June 28, 1898, chap. 517, § 29 (30 Stat. at L. 495, 505, 507), and he contends that that act, as well as the act of 1902, § 11, gave him a right of property in common with the other members of the tribe. Jones v. Meehan, 175 U. S. 1, 44 L. ed. 49, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

On July 1, 1898, an act of Congress granted an appeal from such decrees to this court, chap. 545 (30 Stat. at L. 591) and an appeal was taken by the Chickasaw Nation. In May, 1899, it was held by this court that the act was intended to open only the question of the constitutionality of the previous legislation, which was sustained, and that the act of July 1, 1898, was not made invalid by the provision in the earlier statute of 1896, that the judgment of the United States courts, on appeal to them, should be final. Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, 174 U. S. 445, 43 L. ed. 1041, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722.

The Indian nations still being dissatisfied, there followed the agreement and the act of 1902 first mentioned in this statement. By § 33 the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court was created. By § 32 it was given appellate jurisdiction over all judgments of the courts in the Indian territory rendered under the above-mentioned act of 1896, admitting persons to citizenship or to enrolment as citizens in any of the said nations. It is admitted that these sections are valid, [101] but it is *contended that § 31, upon which the decree rests, is void. By that section it is provided that the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations may file a bill in the new court to annul all the said judgments or decrees of the United States courts, on the ground that notice should have been given to both nations, whereas it was given only to one, or on the ground that the proceedings should have been confined to a review of the action of the Dawes commission on the evidence submitted to that commission, and should not have extended to a trial de novo of the question of citizenship. The suit was to be confined to a determination of these questions of law. In case the judgment or decrees should be annulled, parties deprived of citizenship were empowered to transfer the proceedings in their cases to the citizenship court for such proceedings as ought to have been had in the United States courts. Several thousand persons being concerned, ten persons admitted to citizenship were to be made defendants and served with process, and there was to be a general notice, also, by publication, with liberty to any person so situated to become a party. A bill was filed, and after proceedings in conformity to the statute, a decree was rendered, annulling all the said judgments or decrees on both the above grounds.

The answer set up that the test case provided for had been decided, and judgment entered and certified to the Dawes commission, on January 15, 1903, before the present petition was filed, and that nothing remained to be done by the citizenship court. It also alleged as an estoppel that, since filing this petition, this petitioner has instituted a suit by way of appeal, as provided in the act of 1902, to have his rights tried by the court on their merits, and further, that if the petitioner is an Indian, he is bound by the vote of his tribe ratifying the agreement sanctioned by said act of 1902. To this answer the petitioner demurred, so that, whether a demurrer was necessary or not, the allegations of the answer are not denied.

On these facts the petitioner contends that § 31 is void because it provides for a personal judgment, the annulling of *the decree [102] obtained by him, without personal service, because Congress has no power to annul or to provide for the annulling of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, not alleged to have been obtained by fraud, and because the annulling of the judgment deprives the petitioner of property rights without due process of law.

It is unnecessary to state the objections to the law more in detail, because we are of opinion that the writ must be denied irrespective of these questions. We need not consider whether the jurisdiction of this court to grant a writ of prohibition to the district courts is confined to cases where those courts are "proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," Rev. Stat. § 688 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 565). Ex parte City Bank, 3 How. 292, 322, 11 L. ed. 603, 617; Ex parte Gordon, 1 Black, 503, 17 L. ed. 134; Ex parte Graham, 10 Wall. 541, 19 L. ed. 981; Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 68, 24 L. ed. 373. As to the jurisdiction in other cases, whether inherent or under Rev. Stat. § 716 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 580), see Re Rice, 155 U. S. 396, 39 L. ed. 198, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 149; Re Huguley Mfg. Co. 184 U. S. 297, 46 L. ed. 549, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 455; Re Chetwood, 165 U. S. 443, 462, 41 L. ed. 782, 788, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 385. Again, we need not consider whether the citizenship court is a court in such a sense as to be subject to prohibition. See Re Vidal, 179 U. S. 126, 45 L. ed. 118, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48; Gordon v. United States, 2 Wall. 561, 17 L. ed. 921, 117 U. S. 697, 702. However these things may be, it is clear that the writ will not issue after the cause is ended, and that the cause in the citizenship court was ended before the present application was heard.

It is stated correctly by the answer that the act does not empower the citizenship court to do anything in the test case beyond rendering its judgment and certifying the same, as it has done. This being so, there is nothing which this court could prohibit, even if it were of opinion that the petitioner made out a good case on the merits, which we do not intimate. Therefore the writ must be denied. United States v. Hoffman, 4 Wall. 158, 18 L. ed. 354; Denton v. Marshall, 1 Hurlst. & C. 654, 660; State ex rel. Hamer v. Stackhouse, 14 S. [103]*ECKINGTON & SOLDIERS' HOME RAILWAY COMPANY of the District of Columbia, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FLORENCE McDEVITT.

Damages—breach of contract—prevented gains.

The difference between the market value of land with street-car service and the expectation that cars will continue always to run, and such value without the operation of the cars, and with no expectation that they will run in the future, is too uncertain to be made the measure of damages for the breach by a street railway company of its covenant to run its cars over an extension, contained in the agreement by which it secured its right of way.

Argued January 21, 1903. Ordered submitted to full bench February 2, 1903. Submitted to full bench March 9, 1903. Decided November 16, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court of that District in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for a breach of contract. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

See same case below, 18 App. D. C. 497.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was an action brought in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, August 8, 1894, to recover damages for alleged breach of contract. Plaintiff, on April 4, 1889, being the owner of a tract of land in the District of Columbia, containing about 22 acres (with her husband, since deceased), entered into an agreement with the Eckington & Soldiers' Home Railway Company, which recited: "Whereas the said parties of the first part, being desirous of securing an extension of the Eckington & Soldiers' Home Railway from the corner of Third and T streets northeast extended, to the east line of Lincoln avenue in the District of Columbia, through and along*the following streets,[104] to wit: West on T street to Second street east extended, thence north on the line of said Second street extended to V street extended east in a right line, and thence west on the line of said V street so extended to the east line of Lincoln avenue; and whereas the said party of the second part has agreed to extend said railway to said Lincoln avenue by the route aforesaid, upon certain conditions hereinafter mentioned;" therefore the McDevitts agreed in consideration of the premises "and of the covenants hereafter mentioned, to be kept and performed" by the railway company, to sell, grant, and convey to it, its successors and assigns, "a right of way, 60 feet in width, for the use of the said party of the second part, its successors and assigns forever, through and along the following land belonging to the said Florence McDevitt," described as "beginning at the southeast corner of the lands of said Florence McDevitt, adjoining the property of George Truesdell known as Eckington, and in the line of Second street east extended northwardly in a right line, and extending thence with uniform width 30 feet on each side of the center of said Second street extended, to a line 15 feet south of the north line of said V street extended, and thence westerly with the same width on each side of the center of said V street extended, to the east line of Lincoln avenue;" also to pay to the railway company $500 five years from the date of the agreement, with interest, to be evidenced by a promissory note. But that the grant was subject to certain "conditions" to wit, that work on the extension should be commenced on or before May 1, 1889, and completed on or before October 1, 1889; that the grades should be as described; that the material removed in grading should be delivered on the lands of the McDevitts as directed by them; that the excavation should not exceed 20 feet in width at bottom and 60 feet at top; and that "after said extension is completed and open for traffic, a car shall be run thereon to Lincoln avenue at least once in thirty minutes between 7.30 A. M. and 6 P. M., and at least once an hour to 9 P. M., and one car at 11 P. M."

NOTE.—On loss of profits as an element of damages for breach of contract—see note to Wells v. National Life Asso. 53 L. R. A. 33.

[105] *The extension was completed in the manner and within the time prescribed, and opened to traffic, and the $500 note was given. On December 27, 1889, a deed was executed and delivered to the company by Mr. and Mrs. McDevitt, in form an indenture, but signed and sealed by the McDevitts alone. This conveyed the right of way to the company, "its successors and assigns forever," with covenants of warranty and further assurance, and it also recited a covenant on the company's part that the cars should be run as described in the contract.

The extension was operated from 1889 to May or June, 1893, when the night cars were taken off. Thereupon, and on June 26, 1893, Mrs. McDevitt filed her bill for specific performance, to which the company set up in its answer, among other things, that the extension had always been a source of great loss, especially in operating at night, and that "the present management of the road, having been advised that their right to operate said extension over the line of proposed streets without authority from Congress was very doubtful, deemed it wise to suspend such operation until the question could be definitely settled."

July 9, 1894, the bill was dismissed but "without prejudice to the right of complainant to resort to such remedy at law as she may be advised." About that time and prior to July 25, 1894, the railway company ceased to operate the extension altogether, and it was testified that the attorney of the company, on its behalf, "refused to do anything in the way of carrying out the contract." On the last named day Mrs. McDevitt notified the company in writing, to forthwith remove its tracks from the premises, and that she should bring an action for breach of contract. The tracks were accordingly removed. In the meantime the $500 note had matured and was not paid.

The evidence tended to show that Mrs. McDevitt had caused a map of a proposed subdivision of the land to be made, but that this had not been recorded, and that nothing had been *done in the way of preparing the tract for subdivision and sale by grading; that no streets had been opened through it except as effected by the action of the railroad company; that the excavations for the railway tracks were what would be Second and V streets, to which extent plaintiff would be relieved from grading. Evidence was introduced of sales by Mrs. McDevitt of four parcels of the land prior to the removal of the tracks, and tending to show the value of the land with and without the railroad in operation through it. Also that the business depression of 1893 caused declines in value, and rendered real estate in the vicinity of this property unsaleable until after 1894.

Among other instructions the court gave the following:

"The jury are instructed that the measure of damages in this case is the excess (if the jury find from the evidence that there was such excess) in the market value of the land at the time that the defendant ceased entirely to run its cars upon that part of its line which extended to and through the plaintiff's land, with the cars running in accordance with the terms of the contract of the parties in evidence, and the expectation of their continuing to so run in the future, over the market value of the same land at the same time without any cars running on said part of said line, and without any expectation that they would ever run thereon."

To the giving of which defendant objected and duly preserved an exception.

The jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $15,000, and, motions in arrest and for a new trial having been made and overruled, judgment was entered thereon, which was affirmed by the court of appeals of the District (18 App. D. C. 497), and this writ of error thereupon sued out.

The railway company was a corporation created by an act of Congress approved June 19, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 190, chap. 419), "with authority to construct and lay down a single or double-track railway, with the necessary switches, turnouts, and other mechanical devices and sewer connections necessary to operate the same by horse, cable, or electric power, in the District of *Columbia, through and along the following [107] avenues, streets, and highways" (describing them), and also a branch as described. The railway was to be laid in the center of the avenues and streets as near as might be, and, in the event of a change of grade of any of the streets, avenues, or roads occupied, it was made the duty of the company, at its own expense, to change its railroad so as to conform to such new grade. The company was to run cars as often as the public convenience might require, in accordance with a time-table or schedule which was to be approved by the commissioners of the District; and was to construct such ticket offices, passenger rooms, etc., at such points on its line as the Commissioners might approve. The government and direction of the affairs of the company were vested in a board of nine directors, who were to choose officers as designated. Congress reserved the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act at any time.

By an act approved April 30, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 77, chap. 172), amending the charter, the company was authorized to extend its tracks through and along certain streets named, which provided "and also beginning at the present terminus of its cemetery branch on the east side of Lincoln avenue, and thence northerly along Lincoln avenue to a point opposite the entrance to Glenwood cemetery."

By an act approved July 5, 1892 (27 Stat. at L. 65, chap. 143), the charter was further amended by authorizing the extension of tracks, and providing "that the tracks of this company on Lincoln avenue shall be taken up within thirty days from the passage of this act, and the roadway shall be restored to public uses in such manner as the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall direct."

Messrs. John Ridout and Walter L. McDermott argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Damages recoverable on a breach of contract are measured by the actual loss sustained, provided such loss is what would naturally result as the ordinary consequence of the breach, or as a consequence which may, under the circumstances, be presumed to have been in the contemplation of both parties as the probable result of a breach.

Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341; Horne v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 C. P. 131; Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 35 L. ed. 147, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500; Gurley v. MacLennan, 17 App. D. C. 170.

Enhanced damages must have entered into the contract, and mere notice of the purpose of making the contract would not have the effect of enhancing damages beyond such as would arise naturally or according to the usual order of things.

Horne v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 C. P. 131; Harvey v. Connecticut & P. Rivers R. Co. 124 Mass. 421, 26 Am. Rep. 673; Ward v. New York C. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 29, 7 Am. Rep. 405; Ward's Central & P. Lake Co. v. Elkins, 34 Mich. 439, 22 Am. Rep. 544; Mather v. American Exp. Co. 138 Mass. 55, 52 Am. Dec. 258.

There was no actual loss sustained by the plaintiff as required by the rule.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hall, 124 U. S. 444, 31 L. ed. 479, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577; Hetzl v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Mackey, 1.

The damage claimed was not the natural and probable consequence of the breach of contract.

Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 210, 35 L. ed. 151, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500.

The mere fact of a fall in market price, if it exist, not resulting in damage, and that may never result in damage, to the plaintiff, does not entitle the plaintiff to recover.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hall, 124 U. S. 444, 31 L. ed. 479, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577.

There was no evidence of market value with or without the cars running, in the proper signification of the term "market value." There had been no public sale, and there was no market value in any legal sense. All the transactions were private and special, and the opinions given in evidence were based upon such transactions, and not upon prices established by public sales in the way of ordinary business, of which, so far as appears, there had never been a single instance.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 467-469.

Mr. Walter L. McDermott also filed an additional brief for plaintiff in error:

Before damage is shown the question must be answered, Did the impairment of value continue?

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hall, 124 U. S. 444, 31 L. ed. 479, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577.

To permit the jury to consider the enhanced value of the land was to permit them to conjecture what profits plaintiff might have made by selling it.

Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341; Horne v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 C. P. 131; Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 35 L. ed. 147, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ft. Scott, 15 Kan. 470.

Profits which plaintiff might have made in any other transactions if defendant had performed the contract, even though the loss is a natural consequence of the wrong, are frequently disallowed on the ground that they are more or less speculative or contingent.

Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckemeier, 72 Ill. 267.

Mr. A. S. Worthington argued the cause, and, with Messrs. John C. Heald and Charles L. Frailey, filed a brief for defendant in error:

Where there is a breach of a contract to expend labor on property the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the property as left by the defendant and the value it would have had if the labor had been expended.

2 Sedgw. Damages, § 615; Kidd v. McCormick, 83 N. Y. 391.

When a railroad company has contracted with a landowner, in consideration of his allowing the company to construct its line through his land, to build and maintain a station on or near his property, and has failed to carry out its contract, the measure of damages in an action on the contract is the difference between the value of the plaintiff's land with the station and without it.

Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Gilmer, 85 Ala. 422, 5 So. 138; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Sumner, 106 Ind. 55, 55 Am. Rep. 719, 5 N. E. 404; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Molloy, 64 Tex. 607; Wilson v. Northampton & B. Junction R. Co. L. R. 9 Ch. 279.

So, when ornamental or fruit-bearing trees, or trees used as a shade for cattle, are destroyed, the measure of damages is not the value of the trees, but the difference between the value of the premises with and without the trees.

3 Sedgw. Damages, § 933, Citing Chipman v. Hibberd, 6 Cal. 162; Wallace v. Goodall, 18 N. H. 439; Argotsinger v. Vines, 82 N. Y. 308; Van Deusen v. Young, 29 Barb. 9.

So, where a railroad company laid its tracks on a street in front of the plaintiff's land, but nearer his land than was necessary, the true measure of damage is the difference in the value of plaintiff's property with the road constructed upon its present line in the street and what that value would have been if the road had been constructed upon a line in said street selected with reasonable care and a proper regard for the rights of all interested.

Cadle v. Muscatine Western R. Co. 44 Iowa, 11.

It does not follow that, because it is difficult to ascertain with precision the injury resulting from a breach of contract, the offending party cannot be called to account at all. Where it is uncertain whether any damages would result from a breach of contract, the plaintiff gets only nominal damages; but where the damage is clear, and the amount of it only, uncertain, the rule invoked does not apply.

Simpson v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 274; Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 54 Am. Rep. 676, 4 N. E. 264; Lanahan v. Heaver, 79 Md. 413, 29 Atl. 1036; Blagen v. Thompson, 23 Or. 239, 18 L. R. A. 315, 31 Pac. 647.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming that the railway company might have lawfully bound itself to construct and operate this piece of road, the question is presented to what compensation in damages plaintiff below would be entitled if the company found that the traffic did not justify its further maintenance, and ceased to run its cars, or if the public interests required such changes of the lines of the road as rendered the abandonment necessary.

[112] Plaintiff had been reinstated in the possession of her land, freed from the encumbrance of the right of way, and had been discharged from the liability to pay the $500. And as the record stands, it is doubtful if any direct specific *damage can properly be held to have been made out. At all events, and conceding that she was entitled to substantial damages for any injurious change of condition, any liability incurred, and any gains prevented, to secure which action had been taken, in reliance on the contract, the instruction as to the measure of damages embraced none of these matters, and was confined to profits only.

The transaction was not a sale of the land where the difference between the price agreed and the market value would represent the measure of loss or gain. Restitution having been made of what plaintiff had parted with, how far could she demand to be compensated for prevented gains or anticipated profits?

The contract did not purport to bind the company to operate its cars over the extension for any designated period, but, considering its terms in relation to the right of way, the trial court held that it was bound in perpetuity, and thereupon that if it ceased to do this in whole or in part at any time, she could order the tracks off her premises, and recover the difference between the value of her land with the cars running and with the expectation that they would continue always to run, and the value without the operation of the cars and with no expectation that they would run in the future.

The instruction was addressed to differences in market value as affected by the running of the cars, with the element added of expectation of continuance or cessation for all time. As thus put the supposed difference in market values amounted to anticipated profits, and these were not recoverable if dependent on uncertain and changing contingencies, and not in contemplation of both parties as a probable consequence of breach. Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 35 L. ed. 147, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500; Globe Ref. Co. v. Landa Cotton Oil Co. 190 U. S. 540, 47 L. ed. 1171, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 754. Whether prevented gains or prospective profits are or are not too uncertain and contingent to be regarded as probable and contemplated consequences is always a question of difficulty, and as in such cases juries are permitted to exercise a wide *discretion[113] in the allowance of damages, great care is required in advising them as to the elements proper to be considered in making up their verdicts.

In a case like this, gain prevented is a more accurate term than loss of profits. And it is said in Sedgwick on Damages, 8th ed. vol. 1, p. 250, § 173: "Where an injured party claims compensation for gain prevented, the amount of loss is always to some extent conjectural; for there is no way of proving that what might have been, would have been. Thus, when the claim is made for compensation for a deprivation of property, it may be that if the property had remained in the owner's control it would have brought no gain."

Here the evidence tended to show that a financial depression prevailed at the time of the breach, and that all real estate in the particular locality was unsaleable. Gains, then, were practically impossible; while, on the other hand, there was evidence that some years after the breach the depression passed away and real estate rose in value.

The books contain many illustrations of the uncertainties which will or may defeat recovery of anticipated profits.

In Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckemeier, 72 Ill. 267, it was held, in a suit against a railroad company for the failure to erect a depot building upon plaintiff's farm, as agreed, that any supposed damage to the farm on that account, growing out of anticipated increased value, was too remote.

In Evans v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 78 Ala. 341, a railroad company agreed to locate houses for its hands near plaintiff's land, and it was held that possible loss of profits at his store and mill was too speculative.

So, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ft. Scott, 15 Kan. 435, where a railroad company failed to perform its agreement to make the city of Fort Scott the terminus of one division of its line, and erect machine shops there, it was held that an inquiry into the value of real estate and amount of business, in order to show what profits would have [114] been *made, was improper; but the city might recover for the value of the buildings to it as taxable property.

Scholten v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (Mo.) 73 S. W. 915, is so far in point that it may well be cited, though not decided by a court of last resort. There the St. Louis court of appeals held that where a railroad's agreement to build and maintain a switch for a private property owner did not affect the performance of the railroad's duties to the public, the railroad was not entitled to allege in an action for illegally destroying the switch, that the contract was void as against public policy; and that as the plaintiff had graded the right of way and furnished the ties, and the agreement did not specify any length of time for the maintenance of the switch, plaintiff was entitled, on the destruction of the switch, to recover the value of the ties, and the cost of grading.

Treating the contract as a simple contract, and the refusal to run the cars as a breach which Mrs. McDevitt could accept as finally determining it, we think she could not recover for deprivation of the speculative gains of a remote future. What might have been made by selling the land at a value enhanced by the operation of the tracks in perpetuity was purely problematical and not naturally in contemplation. And the more so in view of the fact that railroad companies, while private corporations, are quasi-public agencies, engaged in the performance of public duties, and that contracts which prevent them from the discharge of those duties cannot be sustained. It did not follow that the company, because it possessed the power to construct and operate this extension, could contract to operate it forever in so absolute a sense that damages could be awarded for the breach of such a contract, predicated on the expectation of its perpetual operation. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846. Again, in this aspect, the instruction treated the agreement as equivalent to a covenant running with the land, and we are inclined to think that the bearing Mrs. McDevitt's demand that the tracks be removed, and the accepted and complete surrender of the right of way *by [115] their removal accordingly, might have had, under all the circumstances, on the question of prospective damages, should not have been excluded from the jury.

We are of opinion that the instruction as given was erroneous, and as it was definite and peremptory in its terms, and as it cannot be said that the jury was not influenced, and perhaps controlled, by it, we hold the error fatal to the judgment. As there must be a new trial we refrain from discussing the suggestions in respect of the acceptance of the deed by the company, a subject much considered in Willard v. Wood, 135 U. S. 309, 34 L. ed. 210, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831, 164 U. S. 502, 41 L. ed. 531, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 176, and the discharge of the alleged covenant, made below, but not pressed in argument here.

Reversed and remanded, with directions to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District, and order a new trial.

Mr. Justice White and Mr. Justice McKenna dissented.

Appeal in bankruptcy proceedings not proper mode of reviewing decisions of circuit courts of appeal on original petition.

Certiorari, and not appeal, is the proper method of obtaining a review in the Supreme Court of the United States of a decision of the circuit court of appeals, made in the exercise of its jurisdiction, under the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. at L. 544, chap. 541

NOTE.—On appeal and review in bankruptcy cases—see note to Re Eggert, 43 C. C. A. 9.

[U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418]), § 24b, to review, by original petition, proceedings of inferior courts of bankruptcy, which revised an order of the district court allowing an exemption, since the revising order of the circuit court of appeals is not "a final decision allowing or rejecting a claim" within the meaning of § 25b, providing for appeals in bankruptcy proceedings to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Submitted October 22, 1903. Decided November 16, 1903.

A PPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a decision which revised an order of the District Court for the District of Washington, allowing an exemption in bankruptcy proceedings. Dismissed.

See same case below, 51 C. C. A. 97, 113 Fed. 141.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Two separate proceedings were commenced in the district court of the United States for the district of Washington, on January 19, 1901, against D. N. Holden and Lizzie Holden, to the end that each be adjudicated a bankrupt, which were consolidated, and on the ensuing 25th of February they were, respectively, so adjudicated. The creditors of each of the bankrupts were the same.

[116] Thereupon J. A. Stratton was duly elected trustee in bankruptcy *of the estate of each of the bankrupts, and qualified as such. The bankrupts, and each of them, applied for exemption in their favor of two certain policies of life insurance in the hands of the trustee. D. N. Holden was insured, and Lizzie Holden was the beneficiary, in both, with the provision that if she should not survive him, payment should be made to his executors, administrators, and assigns.

The exemption was disallowed by the referee, who reported his action to the court. The bankrupts filed exceptions to the report, and the court on July 16, 1901, set it aside and adjudged the policies to be exempt. Stratton then filed a petition in the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit for a revision of this order. It was therein alleged among other things that the policies had a present cash surrender value combined of about $2,200. The circuit court of appeals, accepting the ruling of that court in the previous case of Re Scheld, 52 L. R. A. 188, 44 C. C. A. 233, 104 Fed. 870, held that the policies were not exempt, and decreed a revision of the order of the district court accordingly. 51 C. C. A. 97, 113 Fed. 141. From this decree an appeal was prayed to this court, and allowed February 12, 1902, and the record was filed here April 14, 1902.

And subsequently a certificate of a justice of this court was filed herein that in his opinion the determination of the questions involved was essential to a uniform construction of the bankruptcy act throughout the United States.

The appeal was submitted on a motion to dismiss, and also on the merits.

Messrs. George Turner and P. P. Carroll submitted the cause for appellants. Mr. John E. Carroll was with them on the brief:

When the lawmakers used "claim" they must have had in mind the common definition of the word.

See, for such definition, Burrill, Law Dict. Vol. 1, p. 296.

Whether a decree is final and appealable is to be decided by the appellate court on a consideration of the essence of what is done by the decree.

Potter v. Beal, 2 C. C. A. 60, 5 U. S. App. 49, 50 Fed. 860.

Mr. Frederiek Bausman submitted the cause for appellee:

Section 24b of the bankruptcy act of 1898, allowing an original petition in the intermediate appellate court, was borrowed from the act of 1867.

Re Abraham, 35 C. C. A. 608, 93 Fed. 783; Re Richards, 37 C. C. A. 634, 96 Fed. 935; Courier-Journal Job-Printing Co. v. Schaefer-Meyer Brewing Co. 41 C. C. A. 614, 101 Fed. 702; Re Worcester County, 42 C. C. A. 637, 102 Fed. 808.

The jurisdiction conferred on the several circuit courts of appeals by subd. b of § 24 of the recent bankrupt act is the same as that which was vested in the circuit court by the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867.

Re Jacobs, 39 C. C. A. 647, 99 Fed. 540.

Appeal did not lie to the supreme court, under the old act, from an adverse ruling of the circuit court "in revision and review" of the district.

Morgan v. Thornhill, 11 Wall. 65, 20 L. ed. 60.

Refusal to allow an exemption to a bankrupt is not a decision "allowing or rejecting a claim."

Re Columbia Real Estate Co. 50 C. C. A. 406, 112 Fed. 645; Re Whitener, 44 C. C. A. 434, 105 Fed. 180.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

It will be perceived that the jurisdiction of the circuit court of appeals was invoked on an original petition under § 24b *of the [117] bankruptcy law, which provides: "The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matter of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy within their jurisdiction. Such power shall be exercised on due notice and petition by any party aggrieved." [30 Stat. at L. 553, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3432.]

This supervisory jurisdiction in matter of law was conferred on the circuit courts by the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. at L. 518, chap. 176, § 2; Rev. Stat. § 4986), and it was settled under that act that appeals to this court did not lie from the decisions of the circuit courts in the exercise of that jurisdiction. Morgan v. Thornhill, 11 Wall. 65, 20 L. ed. 60; Conro v. Crane, 94 U. S. 441, 24 L. ed. 145. The ruling is decisive here unless the present act elsewhere otherwise provides. But this it does not do, the special and summary character of the revision contemplated being substantially the same as in the prior act, and the provision for appeals not embracing appeals from decrees in revision.

Section 25a provides "that appeals, as in equity cases, may be taken in bankruptcy proceedings from the courts of bankruptcy to the circuit court of appeals of the United States, and to the supreme court of the territories, in the following cases, to wit, (1) from a judgment adjudging or refusing to adjudge the defendant a bankrupt; (2) from a judgment granting or denying a discharge; and (3) from a judgment allowing or rejecting a debt or claim of $500 or over."

And § 25b for appeals to this court "from any final decision of a court of appeals, allowing or rejecting a claim under this act," where the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of $2,000, and the question involved was one which might have been taken from the highest court of a state to the Supreme Court of the United States; or where some justice of the Supreme Court certifies that "in his opinion, the determination of the question or questions involved in the allowance or rejection of such claim is essential to a uniform construction of this act throughout the United States."

118] *This case was not taken to the court of appeals by appeal, as in equity cases, to be re-examined on the facts as well as the law, nor could it have been, for it was not one of the cases enumerated in § 25a. The order of the district court was not "a judgment allowing or rejecting a debt or claim of $500 or over," or the revising order of the circuit court of appeals, "a final decision, allowing or rejecting a claim," within the intent and meaning of either subdivision a or b. By § 2, sub. 2, courts of bankruptcy are vested with the power to "allow claims, disallow claims, reconsider allowed or disallowed claims, and allow or disallow them against bankrupt estates;" and § 57 comprehensively covers the subject of the proof and allowance of claims, treating them as moneyed demands.

And while the word "claim" is used in its signification of the demand or assertion of a right in sub. 11 of § 2, in respect of "all claims of bankrupts to their exemptions," it is also used in many parts of the act, and, as we think, in § 25, as referring to debts (which by sub-sect. 11 of § 1 include "any debt, demand, or claim provable in bankruptcy") presented for proof against estates in bankruptcy. Hutchinson v. Otis, 190 U. S. 552, 555, 47 L. ed. 1179, 1180, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 778; Re Whitener, 44 C. C. A. 434, 105 Fed. 180; Re Columbia Real Estate Co. 50 C. C. A. 406, 112 Fed. 645.

The allowance or rejection of a debt or claim is a part of the bankruptcy proceedings, and not an independent suit, and under the act of 1867 it was held that this court had no jurisdiction to review judgments of the circuit courts dealing with the action of the district courts in such allowance or rejection, because they were not final. Wiswall v. Campbell, 93 U. S. 347, 23 L. ed. 923; Leggett v. Allen, 110 U. S. 741, 28 L. ed. 313, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195. The jurisdiction now given is carefully restricted, and cannot be expanded beyond the letter of the grant. It is an exception to the general rule as to appeals and writs of error obtaining from the foundation of our judicial system. McLish v. Roff, 141 U. S. 661, 35 L. ed. 893, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118.

The distinction between steps in bankruptcy proceedings proper and controversies arising out of the settlement of the *estates of [119] bankrupts is recognized in §§ 23, 24, and 25 of the present act, and the provisions as to revision in matter of law and appeals were framed and must be construed in view of that distinction. First Nat. Bank v. Klug, 186 U. S. 202, 46 L. ed. 1127, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 899; Elliott v. Toeppner, 187 U. S. 327, 333, 334, 47 L. ed. 200, 203, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133.

Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891 [26 Stat. at L. 828, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 549, 550], has no application, as that refers to cases carried to the circuit court of appeals by appeal or writ of error. But in view of the terms of that act and of the nature of the writ, we have held that under a reasonable construction of subdivision d of § 25, certiorari lies to decrees in revision. Bryan v. Bernheimer, 175 U. S. 724, 44 L. ed. 338, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1031, 181 U. S. 188, 45 L. ed. 814, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557; Mueller v. Nugent, 180 U. S. 640, 45 L. ed. 711, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 927, 184 U. S. 1, 46 L. ed. 405, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269; Louisville Trust Co. v. Cominger, 181 U. S. 620, 45 L. ed. 1031, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 946, 184 U.

S. 18, 46 L. ed. 413, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 293. In the case first cited it is pointed out that the circuit court of appeals treated the case as if before it on a petition for revision, though it had been carried there by appeal; and we considered the decree as rendered in the exercise of the supervisory power. 181 U. S. 192, 193, 45 L. ed. 815, 816, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557.

Appeal dismissed.

G. C. BUFORD.

Appeal—review of judgment of circuit court of appeals in action by national bank.

1. The jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court to review a judgment of the circuit court of appeals must be first considered, where the question in regard thereto arises on the face of the record.
2. The judgment of the circuit court of appeals is final, and not subject to review by the United States Supreme Court, in an action by a national bank against a corporation of another state, where no Federal questions are presented upon which the suit depends, under the judiciary act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 488, 547]), making the judgment of the circuit court of appeals final where the jurisdiction of the court below depended entirely on the diverse citizenship of the parties, and the act of August 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 433, chap. 866 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 514]), providing that in an action by or against national banking associations the circuit and district courts shall not have jurisdiction other than such as they would have in cases between individual citizens of the same state.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas in an action by a national bank against a corporation of another state. Dismissed.

See same case below, 53 C. C. A. 14, 114 Fed. 290.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Rhea P. Cary argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. J. Orr argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error.

191 U. S.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

Has this court authority to review the judgment of the circuit court of appeals in this case?

This question arises upon the face of the record, and cannot be ignored; for, the rule is well established that, "on every writ of error or appeal, the first and fundamental question is that of jurisdiction, first of this court, and then of the court from which the record comes." Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 382, 28 L. ed. 462, 464, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; King Bridge Co. v. Oloee County, 120 U. S. 225, 30 L. ed. 623, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522; Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 151 U. S. 673, 690, 38 L. ed. 311, 317, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533; Powers v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 169 U. S. 92, 98, 42 L. ed. 673, 675, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264; Great Southern Fire-Proof Hotel Co. v. Jones, 177 U. S. 449, 453, 44 L. ed. 842, 844, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 690.

The plaintiff in error, plaintiff below,—the Continental National Bank, organized under the acts of Congress, and located for purposes of business at Memphis, Tennessee,—alleged in its complaint that the Bank of Mammoth Springs, an Arkansas corporation, was indebted to it in a named sum, and it sought by this action to hold the defendant liable for the amount of such debt.

The action was based upon certain sections of the statutes of Arkansas (Sandels' & Hill's Digest), as follows:

"§ 1337. The president and secretary of every corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall annually make *a cer-[121] tificate showing the condition of the affairs of such corporation, as nearly as the same can be ascertained, on the 1st day of January or of July next preceeding the time of making such certificate, in the following particulars; viz.: The amount of capital actually paid in; the cash value of its real estate; the cash value of its personal estate; the cash value of its credits; the amount of its debts; the name and number of shares of each stockholder; which certificate shall be deposited on or before the 15th day of February or of August with the county clerk of the county in which said corporation transacts its business, who shall record the same at length in a book to be kept by him for that purpose."

"§ 1346. The certificates required by §§ 1334, 1337, 1343, and 1344, except certificates of transfers of stock, shall be made under oath or affirmation by the person subscribing the same; and if any person shall knowingly swear or affirm falsely as to any material facts he shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and be punished accordingly.

"§ 1347. If the president or secretary of any such corporation shall neglect or refuse to comply with the provisions of § 1337, and to perform the duties required of them respectively, the persons so neglecting or refusing shall jointly and severally be liable to an action founded on this statute for all debts of such corporation contracted during the period of any such neglect or refusal."

The complaint alleged that during the entire period of his term of office as president of the Bank of Mammoth Springs, that is, from June 9th, 1891, to June 9th, 1896, the defendant Buford "wholly neglected to comply with the provisions and perform the duties required of him by said §§ 1337 and 1346, by making, swearing to, and causing to be filed, the statement or certificate required thereby."

The defendant demurred to the complaint on various grounds; one being that the plaintiff's action appeared to be barred by the statute of limitations of Arkansas. The circuit court sustained the demurrer, it being of opinion that the complaint did *not show any cause of action; also, that a suit for the debt in question was barred by the statute of limitations of Arkansas. The plaintiff declining to amend, the suit was dismissed. That judgment was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, 53 C. C. A. 14, 114 Fed. 290, and from that judgment the present writ of error was prosecuted.

By the very terms of the judiciary act of March 3d, 1891, 26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 488, 547), the judgment of a circuit court of appeals of the United States is final where the jurisdiction of the circuit court depended entirely upon the diverse citizenship of the parties. No ground whatever of jurisdiction in the circuit court appears in the complaint or elsewhere in the record, other than diversity in the citizenship of the parties, unless it can be said that by reason alone of the plaintiff bank having been organized under an act of Congress the suit is one arising under the laws of the United States. This, however, could not be said of the present suit, if regard be had to the acts of Congress defining and regulating the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

The judiciary act of March 3d, 1875, for the first time invested the circuit courts of the United States, without reference to the citizenship of the parties, with original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeded a prescribed sum, and the suit was one "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States." [18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 508).] Referring to that statute, this court, in Petri v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 142 U. S. 644, 648, 35 L. ed. 1144, 1145, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 325, 326, said: "Suits by or against national banks might therefore be brought or removed upon the ground of diverse citizenship, or of subject-matter, since, as they were created by Congress, and could acquire no right, make no contract, and bring no suit, which was not authorized by a law of the United States, a suit by or against them was necessarily a suit arising under the laws of the United States. Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204; Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Cooper, 120 U. S. 778, 30 L. ed. 816, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 777; Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, 115 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 319, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1113. And, of course, national banks as *well as state banks and individuals, might bring or remove suits otherwise arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States."

But, in respect of national bank associations, a radical change was introduced by subsequent acts of Congress.

By the act of July 12th, 1882, chap. 290, it was provided: "That the jurisdiction for suits hereafter brought by or against any association established under any law providing for national banking associations, except suits between them and the United States, or its officers and agents, shall be the same as, and not other than, the jurisdiction for suits by or against banks not organized under any law of the United States which do or might do banking business, where such national banking associations may be doing business when such suits may be begun: And all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with this proviso be, and the same are hereby, repealed." 22 Stat. at L. 162 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3457). Then came the judiciary act of March 3d, 1887, corrected by the act of August 13th, 1888, chap. 866, and providing: "That all national banking associations established under the laws of the United States shall, for the purposes of all actions by or against them, real, personal, or mixed, and all suits in equity, be deemed citizens of the states in which they are respectively located; and in such cases the circuit and district courts shall not have jurisdiction other than such as they would have in cases between individual citizens of the same state. The provisions of this section shall not be held to affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in cases commenced by the United States or by direction of any officer thereof, or cases for winding up the affairs of any such bank." 25 Stat. at L. 433 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 514).

The necessary effect of this legislation was to make national banks, for purposes of suing and being sued in the circuit courts of the United States, citizens of the states in which they were respectively located, and to withdraw from them the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States simply upon the ground that [124] they were created *by, and exercised their powers under, acts of Congress. No other purpose can be imputed to Congress than to effect that result. Of course, notwithstanding the acts of 1882 and 1888, there remained to a national bank, independently of its Federal origin, and as a citizen of the state in which it was located, the right to invoke the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts in any suit involving the required amount, and which, by reason of its subject-matter, and not by reason simply of the Federal origin of the bank, was a suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States. Petri v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 142 U. S. 644, 648, 35 L. ed. 1144, 1145, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 325. Treating the plaintiff as a citizen of Tennessee, its right to sue the defendant in the Federal court, sitting in Arkansas, was beyond dispute. But, as already suggested, it did not assert any right, privilege, or immunity that was dependent in any degree upon the Constitution or laws of the United States. As jurisdiction could not arise merely from the Federal origin of the plaintiff bank, and as no Federal question was involved in the suit, it must be taken that the only ground of jurisdiction in the circuit court was the diverse citizenship of the parties. If, apart from the fact that the plaintiff bank was a Federal corporation, the suit had been one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, it could not have been said that the jurisdiction of the circuit court depended entirely upon diverse citizenship of the parties. But as no Federal questions, upon which the suit depended, are presented by the record, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals in this case was final and, therefore, not subject to review by this court.

What we have said is, we think, required by the decision in Ex parte Jones, 164 U. S. 691, 41 L. ed. 601, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222. It appeared in that case that a judgment for money was recovered in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts. Its amount was paid and subsequently deposited in a national bank. The bank having refused to pay over the money, suit was brought against it. The suit was dismissed by the circuit court and the judgment of dismissal was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals. The latter court having refused to allow an appeal upon the ground that an appeal was not given by the statute, proceedings by mandamus were instituted to compel it to do so. After referring to the clause in the judiciary act of 1888, declaring that national banking asso-[125]ciations should be deemed citizens of the states in which they were respectively located, and that the circuit and district courts should not have jurisdiction, other than such as they would have in cases between individual citizens of the same states, the court said: "In Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Cooper, 120 U. S. 778, 30 L. ed. 816, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 777, it was held by this court that, under the act of 1882, which was similar in its terms [to that of 1888], an action against a national bank could not be removed to the Federal court, 'unless a similar suit could be entertained by the same court by or against a state bank in like situation with the national bank. Consequently, so long as the act of 1882 was in force, nothing in the way of jurisdiction could be claimed by a national bank because of the source of its incorporation. A national bank was, by that statute, placed before the law in this respect the same as a bank not organized under the laws of the United States.' . . . In this case the original bill averred the complainant to be a citizen of Pennsylvania, and the defendant to be a national bank, duly established under the laws of the United States, having its place of business at Boston, and a citizen of the state of Massachusetts. As the bill was filed after the act of 1888 took effect, it must be deemed to be a suit dependent upon citizenship alone. . . . The petition for mandamus must be denied." Of course, that suit would not have been so regarded, and the petition would have been granted, if the Federal origin of the bank had been itself ground of jurisdiction, independently of the diverse citizenship of the parties.

For the reasons stated, the writ of error must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court to review the final order of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Dismissed.

ishment—equal protection of the laws—due process of law—error to state court—Federal question.

1. A decision of the highest state court that a conspiracy to defraud is a crime under the laws of the state concludes the Supreme Court of the United States on habeas corpus to inquire into a detention under a conviction for that crime in a court of the state.
2. Whether an indictment in a state court sufficiently charged an offense is not open to inquiry on habeas corpus to inquire into a detention under a conviction in the state court.
3. A sentence of the state court of ten years' imprisonment for the offense of a conspiracy to defraud is not so cruel or unusual as requires the interference by the Supreme Court of the United States on habeas corpus.
4. The equal protection of the laws is not denied to two of three persons convicted of conspiracy to defraud, because their sentence was for ten years' imprisonment, while that of their codefendant was for but seven years.
5. The omission on a criminal trial in the state court of any reference to the presumption of innocence cannot be regarded as a denial of due process of law, where the highest court of the state has held that such omission does not invalidate the proceedings.
6. The decision in the opinion of the highest state court, in reviewing a conviction of crime, of questions respecting due process of law, the equal protection of the laws, and cruel and unusual punishment, will not confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of the United States of a writ of error to the state court, in the absence of any claim to protection under the Federal Constitution made therein.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

At the June term, 1901, of the superior court of Guilford county, North Carolina, the three parties named as appellants in the first of these cases and as plaintiffs in error in the second were indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of conspiracy. *Daly[127] was sentenced to the penitentiary for seven years, and the other two for ten years each. All appealed to the supreme court of the state, by which court the judgment was affirmed (129 N. C. 584, 40 S. E. 71), and thereupon the writ of error in the last case was issued. A writ of habeas corpus was also sued out from the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of North Carolina, directed to the warden of the state prison, which, after hearing, was dismissed, and from such dismissal an appeal was taken to this court; and that is the first of the above cases.

Messrs. Frank P. Blair and Leslie A. Gilmore argued the cause and filed a brief for Howard et al.:

The sentence is more severe than that inflicted in North Carolina for a like, or graver, offense.

State v. Jackson, 82 N. C. 565, State v. Mallett, 125 N. C. 718, 34 S. E. 651.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Although these are separate cases, coming from different courts, we shall consider them together, for the same proceedings are challenged in each.

[135] *We premise that the trial was had in a state court, and therefore our range of inquiry is not so broad as it would be if it had been in one of the courts of the United States. The highest court of the state has affirmed the validity of the proceedings in that trial, and we may not interfere with its judgment unless some right guaranteed by the Federal Constitution was denied, and the proper steps taken to preserve for our consideration the question of that denial.

The first contention demanding notice is that the indictment charged no crime. As found it contained three counts, but the two latter were abandoned, and therefore the inquiry is limited to the sufficiency of the first. That charged a conspiracy to defraud. There is in North Carolina no statute defining or punishing such a crime, but the supreme court held that it was a common-law offense, and as such cognizable in the courts of the state. In other words, the supreme court decided that a conspiracy to defraud was a crime punishable under the laws of the state, and that the indictment sufficiently charged the offense. Whether there be such an offense is not a Federal question, and the decision of the supreme court is conclusive upon the matter. Neither are we at liberty to inquire whether the indictment sufficiently charged the offense. Caldwell v. Texas, 137 U. S. 692, 698, 34 L. ed. 816, 818, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Davis v. Texas, 139 U. S. 651, 652, 35 L. ed. 300, 301, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675; Bergemann v. Backer, 157 U. S. 655, 39 L. ed. 845, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 727.

Again, it is contended that the defendants were denied the equal protection of the laws, in that the sentence was more severe than ever before inflicted in North Carolina for a like offense, and was cruel and unusual, in that two were given ten years' and the third only seven years' imprisonment, and also in that they were sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary instead of to hard labor on the public roads. No case of a similar offense is cited from the judicial reports of North Carolina, and the supreme court in its opinion refers to the crime as "a fashion of swindling which has doubtless been little practiced in this state." That for other offenses, which may be considered by most, if not all, of a more grievous character, less punishments have been inflicted, does not make this sentence cruel. Undue leniency in one case does not transform a reasonable punishment in another case to a cruel one. Swindling by means of a pretended gold brick is no trifling crime, and a conspiracy to defraud by such means does not commend itself to sympathy or leniency. But it is unnecessary to attempt to lay down any rule for determining exactly what is necessary to render a punishment cruel and unusual, or under what circumstances this court will interfere with the decision of a state court in respect thereto. It is enough to refer to Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 34 L. ed. 519, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 930, in which these questions were discussed, and to say that a sentence of ten years for an offense of the nature disclosed by the testimony, especially after it has been sustained by the supreme court of a state, does not seem to us deserving to be called cruel. If the effect of this sentence is to induce like criminals to avoid its territory, North Carolina is to be congratulated, not condemned. Doubtless there were sufficient reasons for giving to one of the conspirators a less term than the others. At any rate, there is no such inequality as will justify us in setting aside the judgment against the two.

So far as respects the sentence of the defendants to the penitentiary instead of to work on the public roads, § 4, chap. 355, p. 631, N. C. Laws 1887, in terms warrants it, for that provides that when the judge presiding is satisfied that there is good reason to fear an attempt to release or injure any person convicted of any of the offenses for which sentences to work on the public roads may be imposed, it shall be lawful for him to sentence to imprisonment in the penitentiary. It is true there is no recital of any such reason to fear, but we cannot hold, in the face of the decision of the supreme court of the state, that the omission of such recital invalidates the judgment.

Again, it is said that there was not due process, because the trial judge refused to instruct the jury on the presumption of innocence. He did charge that the guilt of [137] the accused must *be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, and that on a failure in this respect it was the duty to acquit. He also explained what is meant by the term "reasonable doubt." The supreme court sustained the charge. Of course, that is a decision of the highest court of the state that in a criminal trial it is sufficient to charge correctly in reference to a reasonable doubt, and that an omission to refer to any presumption of innocence does not invalidate the proceedings. In the face of this ruling as to the law of the state, the omission in a state trial of any reference to the presumption of innocence cannot be regarded as a denial of due process of law.

These are the principal matters presented by counsel. Some of them were argued elaborately both in brief and orally; especially that in reference to the absence of any statute providing for the punishment of conspiracy, and the alleged absence of any common-law offense of that nature. We have not deemed it necessary to review the various authorities, or enter upon any discussion of the matter, because we are of opinion that the decision of the supreme court of the state in reference thereto is conclusive upon us.

It does not appear that the Federal character of the questions was presented to the supreme court of the state, although in the opinions of the supreme court the questions themselves were fully discussed. But in the absence of any claim to protection under the Federal Constitution, we are compelled to hold that we have no jurisdiction in the case coming from the supreme court of the state, and the writ of error will be dismissed.

The same questions were presented in the habeas corpus case, and as that comes to us from a Federal court, we have jurisdiction, and in that case the judgment will be affirmed.

The motions in respect to change of custody of the defendants *will, in view of the [138] conclusion on the merits of the cases, be denied.

Mr. Justice Harlan concurs in the result.

STATE OF INDIANA, on the Relation of MARTHA and BENJAMIN LEWIS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 138-150.)

Error to state court—personal interest of officer entitling to.

1. A personal, and not an official, interest is necessary to entitle one to a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court to review the judgment of a state court.
2. A county auditor does not have a personal interest entitling him to a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court to review the judgment of a state court requiring him to deduct from the assessed valuation of certain real estate the amount of a mortgage thereon, in accordance with a statute of such state, even though a judgment personal in form has been rendered against him for costs, where he did not move for a modification of the judgment in that particular.

Argued October 22, 23, 1903. Decided November 16, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court of Marion County on a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the deduction from the assessed valuation of real estate of the amount of a mortgage thereon. Dismissed.

See same case below, 158 Ind. 543, 63 N. E. 25, 214, 64 N. E. 18.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a petition filed in the circuit court of Marion county by the state, upon the relation of Martha and Benjamin Lewis, against the auditor of Marion county, for a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant, in his official capacity, to allow an exemption of a mortgage of $500 upon a lot of land in Indianapolis owned by the relators, and that the same be deducted from the value of such lot.

The petition was based upon an act passed by the general assembly March 4, 1899, the first section of which declares: "That any person being the owner of real estate liable for taxation within the state of Indiana, and being indebted in any sum, secured by mortgage upon real estate, may have the amount of such mortgage indebtedness, not exceeding $700, existing and unpaid upon [139] the first day of *April of any year, deducted from the assessed valuation of mortgage premises for that year, and the amount of such valuation remaining after such deduction shall have been made shall form the basis for assessment and taxation for said real estate for said year." [Horner's Anno. Stat. (Ind.) § 6272*a*.]

An alternative writ having been issued, defendant interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court, and the relators declining to plead further, judgment was entered against them.

Upon appeal to the supreme court, the action of the court below was reversed, the law held to be constitutional, and the cause remanded. 158 Ind. 543, 63 N. E. 25, 214, 64 N. E. 18. Thereupon the defendant made formal return to the writ, alleging the unconstitutionality of the act, both under the state and Federal Constitutions, to which relators demurred. The demurrer was sustained, and a judgment entered for a peremptory mandamus commanding the defendant to allow the exemption, and to deduct from the assessed valuation of the real estate the amount of the mortgage, $500, and also that relators recover from the defendant their costs, which, however, appear never to have been taxed. This judgment was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court upon the authority of its opinion upon the previous appeal, and a writ of error sued out from this court.

Mr. Horace E. Smith argued the cause, and, with Mr. Roscoe O. Hawkins, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff in error has such an interest in the cause of action that he not only may, but must, prosecute the action.

Mr. Cassius C. Hadley argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Charles W. Miller, L. G. Rothschild, and William C. Geake, filed a brief for defendant in error:

Plaintiff in error has no right to prosecute his writ of error in this court, since he does not show that he has any just cause for complaint.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The constitutionality of the exemption law of Indiana was apparently the only question raised by the parties. It was argued elaborately, both in the circuit and supreme court of the state, and was finally affirmed by a majority of the latter court. The power of the county auditor, who is charged by law with the duty of making the assessment, to refuse to allow the relators their exemption upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of the act, does not appear to have been raised in the state courts, and is not noticed in either opinion of the supreme court. In fact, the celerity of the proceedings and the admissions of counsel indicate that the suit was begun and carried on for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the law, and that the litigation was, at least, not an unfriendly one.

We have no doubt of the power of state courts to assume jurisdiction of the case if they chose to do so, although there are many authorities to the effect that a ministerial officer, charged by law with the duty of enforcing a certain statute, cannot refuse to perform his plain duty thereunder upon the ground that, in his opinion, it is repugnant to the Constitution.

It is but just to say, however, that the power of a public officer to question the constitutionality of a statute as an excuse for refusing to enforce it has often been assumed, and sometimes directly decided, to exist. In any event, it is a purely local question, and seems to have been so treated by this court in Huntington v. Worthen, 120

U. S. 97, 101, 30 L. ed. 588, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469.

Different considerations, however, apply to the jurisdiction of this court, which we have recently held can only be invoked by a party having a personal interest in the litigation. It follows that he cannot sue out a writ of error in behalf of third persons. Tyler v. Registration Court Judges, 179 U. S. 405, 45 L. ed. 252, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206; Clark v. Kansas City, 176 U. S. 114, 44 L. ed. 392, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 284; Turpin v. Lemon, 187 U. S. 51, 47 L. ed. 70, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 20; Lampases v. Bell, 180 U. S. 276, 45 L. ed. 527, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 368; Ludeling v. Chaffe, 143 U. S. 301, 36 L. ed. 313, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439; Giles v. Little, 134 U. S. 645, 33 L. ed. 1062, 10 Sup. [149] Ct. Rep. 623. These authorities *control the present case. It is evident that the auditor had no personal interest in the litigation. He had certain duties as a public officer to perform. The performance of those duties was of no personal benefit to him. Their nonperformance was equally so. He neither gained nor lost anything by invoking the advice of the supreme court as to the proper action he should take. He was testing the constitutionality of the law purely in the interest of third persons, viz., the taxpayers, and in this particular the case is analogous to that of Caffrey v. Oklahoma, 177 U. S. 346, 44 L. ed. 799, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 664. We think the interest of an appellant in this court should be a personal, and not an official, interest, and that the defendant, having sought the advice of the courts of his own state in his official capacity, should be content to abide by their decision.

It is true there seems to have been a personal judgment in form against the defendant for costs, the amount of which, however, has never been taxed, and when taxed and paid would probably be reimbursed to him. It was formerly held, under the practice which disqualified interested witnesses, that a liability for costs was sufficient to render a witness incompetent. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 401, 402. But it seems to be well settled that even if the fact that costs are awarded against a party gives him an appealable interest, of which there appears to be considerable doubt (Travis v. Waters, 12 Johns. 500; Reid v. Vanderheyden, 5 Cow. 719, 736), it does not give him an appealable interest in the judgment upon the merits, but limits him to the mere question of costs. Studabaker v. Markley, 7 Ind. App. 368, 34 N. E. 606; Hone v. Van Schaick, 7 Paige, 221; Card v. Bird, 10 Paige, 426; Cuyler v. Morland, 6 Paige, 273. If plaintiff in error objected to this judgment for costs, he might have moved to modify it in that particular. Not having done so, his appeal is presumptively from the judgment on the merits (American Ins. Co. v. Gibson, 104 Ind. 336, 342, 3 N. E. 892), and as his individual rights were not affected by such judgment, he is not entitled to an appeal.

The fact that the various statutes fixing the jurisdiction of *the circuit court of the [150] United States, and of this court, which, from the original judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. at L. 73, chap. 20] have, where the amount involved was made the test of jurisdiction, uniformly used the words "exclusive of costs," would indicate, so far as the Federal courts are concerned, that a mere judgment for costs could not ordinarily be made the basis of an appeal to this court.

For the reasons above given the appellant did not have the requisite interest to maintain this appeal, and it is therefore dismissed.

Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice White are of opinion that the plaintiff in error was entitled to prosecute the present writ, and that the court should determine the case upon its merits.

CITY OF JOPLIN, Appt.,
v.
SOUTHWEST MISSOURI LIGHT COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 150-158.)

Electric lighting—implied contract of city not to enter competition.

An implied contract that the city will not, for twenty years, enter into the business of commercial electric lighting, does not arise from a municipal grant to certain persons under the authority of Mo. Laws 1891, p. 60, of the right to erect and maintain an electric light plant for that period, where such grant is not exclusive.

Argued October 20, 1903. Decided November 16, 1903.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri to review a decree enjoining a municipality from entering into the business of commercial electric lighting. Reversed and remanded for the dismissal of the bill. See same case below, 113 Fed. 817.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

Bill in equity to restrain the appellant from supplying its inhabitants with incandescent lights or other electric lighting in competition with the appellee.

The city of Joplin is a municipality of the state of Missouri; the appellee is a corporation of said state, and the jurisdiction of the circuit court was invoked on the ground that the action of the city impaired the obligation of the contract existing between it and the appellee, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and hence the appeal directly to this court.

A preliminary injunction was granted. 101 Fed. 23. It was made perpetual upon final hearing, and a decree was entered enjoining the city "from supplying or furnishing to the inhabitants, residents, or any other person, firm, or corporation within said city, or any addition thereto or extension thereof, electric lights, either incandescent or arc, or in any other form or manner, for commercial or private lighting, for and during the full term" of the grant to the predecessors and assignors of appellee, to wit, the term of twenty years from and after October 7, 1891. 113 Fed. 817.

A statute of Missouri (Laws 1891, p. 60) authorizes cities to erect, maintain, and operate electric light works, to light the streets, and supply the inhabitants with light for their own use, and to establish rates therefor. Or they may, the statute provides, "grant the right to any person or persons or corporation to erect such works . . . upon such terms as may be prescribed by ordinance, provided further that such right . . . shall not extend for a longer period than twenty years." Subsequently to, and in pursuance of, this statute, the city, by ordinance, October 7, 1891, [152] granted the right to *erect and maintain an electric light plant to certain persons, naming them, their successors and assigns, for a period of twenty years. The plant was erected at considerable expense, and has ever since been maintained and operated. The appellee is the successor of the original grantees.

The ordinance conferred rights and exacted obligations, and fixed, besides, the rates to be charged. It also provided for its written acceptance within ten days after its passage, and the commencement of the work within sixty days. It was accepted.

Subsequently (March, 1899), the city, acting in pursuance of, and in the manner provided in, certain ordinances, issued bonds to the amount of $30,000, "for the purpose of erecting an electric light plant, to be owned, controlled, and operated by the city," and by the means obtained thereby constructed electrical works, erected poles and wires, established a schedule of rates, and entered into the business of commercial electrical lighting in competition with appellee. The bill alleged that the appellee was the owner of real and personal property within the city, which is assessed by the city for municipal taxation, and that appellee is compelled, by reason of such taxation, "to aid and assist in operating and maintaining defendant's (the city's) electric plant and business as a rival and competing one" with appellee's electrical plant and business.

Mr. C. H. Montgomery argued the cause, and, with Mr. Samuel W. Moore, filed a brief for appellant:

As the city of Joplin did not expressly grant an exclusive franchise, or expressly disable itself from erecting and maintaining an electric light plant, no such restrictions will be created by implication.

S. 587, 45 L. ed. 679, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Pearsall v. Great Northern R. Co. 161 U. S. 664, 40 L. ed. 844, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705; St. Paul Gaslight Co. v. St. Paul, 181 U. Newburyport*, 103 Fed. 587.

The power of the city of Joplin to erect and operate its own electric light plant, and the power to grant to some person or corporation a franchise therefor, are concurrent powers.

Skaneateles Waterworks Co. v. Skaneateles, 184 U. S. 354, 46 L. ed. 585, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400.

Mr. John A. Eaton argued the cause, and, with Mr. J. McD. Trimble, filed a brief for appellee:

The express provisions of the statute and contract shall be first considered, and then what is necessarily implied from such express provisions. This is the only rule for finding the true and entire contract.

The following cases fully support the right to an injunction in this suit:

Los Angeles City Water Co. 177 U. S. 558, 44 L. ed. 886, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 736.

Mr. Justice McKenna, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court:

The foundation of the suit is that the ordinances of March, 1899, and the acts and conduct of the city in entering into competition with the complainant (appellee) impair the obligation of the contract impliedly arising from the ordinance of October 7, 1891, and the acceptance thereof by appellee. In other words, it is contended that under the statute of the state, which we have quoted, the city was given the power to *construct an [156] electrical plant and erect poles, etc., to "supply private lights for the use of the inhabitants of the city," or it could grant that right "to any person or persons or corporation" upon such terms as might be prescribed by ordinance. It chose the latter, and granted to the assignors of appellee the right given by the statute, and expressed it to be "in consideration of the benefits to be derived therefrom." And it is hence contended that thereby the city contracted not to build works of its own, and that by doing so it violated § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract, and also violated that clause of the 14th Amendment of that instrument, which provides that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law.

It is by implication from the statute and the ordinance passed under it, not from the explicit expression of either, that the conclusion is deduced that the city is precluded from erecting its own lighting plant, and yet it is conceded that the grant to the appellee is not exclusive. That is, it is conceded the city has not exhausted its power under the statute by the grant held by appellee, but may make another to some other person than the appellee. In other words, that the city may make a competitor to appellee, but cannot itself become such competitor. The strength of the argument urged to support the distinction is in the consideration that competition by the city would be more effective than competition by private persons or corporations—indeed, might be destructive. The city, it is further urged, could be indifferent to profits, and could tax its competitor to compensate losses. But this is speculation and it may be opposed by speculation, and there are, besides, counter-vailing considerations. The limitation contended for is upon a governmental agency, and restraints upon that must not be readily implied. The appellee concedes, as we have seen, that it has no exclusive right, and yet contends for a limitation upon the city [157]which might give it (the appellee) *a practical monopoly. Others may not seek to compete with it, and if the city cannot, the city is left with a useless potentiality, while the appellee exercises and enjoys a practically exclusive right. There are presumptions, we repeat, against the granting of exclusive rights, and against limitations upon the powers of government.

Many cases illustrate this principle, and some of them were decided in response to contentions similar to those made in the case at bar. In Skaneateles Waterworks Co. v. Skaneateles, 184 U. S. 354, 46 L. ed. 585, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400, the village of Skaneateles, under statutes of the state of New York, granted to the water company the right to construct waterworks, and contracted with it to supply water to the village and its inhabitants for the period of five years. At the expiration of the term of the contract some difference arose about the terms of its continuance, and the village constructed an independent system of waterworks. A suit was brought by the water company to restrain the further construction of the works and their operation, and the company contended that under the statute of the state by which the village granted to the company its franchises, the village had the election to construct works, or confer such power upon a private company like the water company, and having elected the latter, it impliedly contracted not to construct works of its own. In reply to this contention this court said, by Mr. Justice Peckham:

"There is no implied contract in an ordinary grant of a franchise, such as this, that the grantor will never do any act by which the value of the franchise granted may in the future be reduced. Such a contract would be altogether too far-reaching and important in its possible consequences in the way of limitation of the powers of a municipality, even in matters not immediately connected with water, to be left to implication. We think none such arises from the facts detailed."

It is true there was an element in that case which is not in the case at bar. The village of Skaneateles had entered into a contract with the water company to take [158]water from the *company. This contract had expired before the city constructed its works. It was not that contract, however, which was alleged to have been impaired, but that which the water company claimed to have been implied by reason of its organization and incorporation, and in pursuance of the application made to, and with the consent of, the village authorities. The ultimate reliance, therefore, of the water company was that from the grant to it the village impliedly contracted not to construct works of its own. The similarity of the contention with that in the case at bar is apparent.

In Bienville Water Supply Co. v. Mobile, 175 U. S. 109, 44 L. ed. 92, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40, 186 U. S. 212, 46 L. ed. 1132, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820, it was again decided that the granting of franchises to private persons to construct waterworks in a city does not preclude the city from afterwards erecting such works, and supplying its inhabitants with water.

Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 341, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77, is not in opposition to these views. The city of Walla Walla was, by the statute incorporating it, empowered to erect waterworks or to authorize the erection of the same. In pursuance of this power it granted a franchise to the Walla Walla company, and contracted to take water from the company, reserving the right to avoid the contract under certain contingencies. But it was provided that: "Until such contract shall have been so avoided, the city of Walla Walla shall not erect, maintain, or become interested in any waterworks except the ones herein referred to, save as hereinafter specified." The contract was in force at the time the suit was brought, and the water company had substantially complied with all of its terms and conditions. The contract passed upon, therefore, was expressed and explicit. The power to make it was sustained. In the case at bar, restraint upon the power of the appellant city is claimed to be implied by the grant to the appellee. We think, for the reasons stated and upon the authorities cited, such restraint cannot be implied.

Decree reversed and case remanded with directions to dismiss the bill.

*ST. LOUIS HAY & GRAIN COMPANY,[159]

Appt.,
v.

UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 159-164.)

Contracts—right to maintain a quantum valebat of one performing a contract invalid because not in writing—what constitutes a breach of.

1. That a contract for the sale of hay to the United States is invalid, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3744, because it had not been reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties, does not entitle the contractor, after furnishing the hay and receiving the contract price, to maintain a quantum valebat on the ground that the value of the hay had increased from the time of the contract to the time of delivery.

191 U. S.

2. A contract for the sale of hay to the United States, under an advertisement providing that awards made under accepted bids will provide that the quantities awarded may be increased or decreased at the option of the United States, not exceeding 20 per cent, and that, if the troops of the United States should be wholly or in part withdrawn, the award shall become inoperative to the extent of such reduction, and that deliveries shall begin in five days from the date of the award, and proceed at daily rates of at least one sixtieth of amount, or in such quantities and at such times afterwards as may be designated by the chief quartermaster,—is not broken by a suspension for some time of orders for hay after the withdrawal of troops, and a continuation of orders for a period of ten months after the award, although the market value of hay is much greater during the later than the earlier part of such period.

*Argued October 30 and November 2, 1903.
Decided November 16, 1903.*

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment dismissing a petition for damages for the breach by the United States of a contract made with it by the claimant. Affirmed.

See same case below, 37 Ct. Cl. 281.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William E. Harvey and George A. King argued the cause, and, with Mr. William B. King, filed a brief for appellant:

The claimant is entitled to recover the value of the hay at the time and place of delivery.

Clark v. United States, 95 U. S. 539, 24 L. ed. 518.

The special contract was void for all purposes.

Filor v. United States, 9 Wall. 45, 19 L. ed. 549; Williams v. Bemis, 108 Mass. 91, 11 Am. Rep. 318.

To sustain the defense of accord and satisfaction there must be both an accord and a satisfaction; that is, there must be an agreement—express or implied—to receive a certain sum in satisfaction of a claim, coupled with payment of that sum.

Memphis v. Brown, 20 Wall. 289, 22 L. ed. 264; Cumber v. Wayne, 1 Smith Lead Cas. 7th Am. ed. 595; Flockton v. Hall, 14 Q. B. 380, 16 Q. B. 1039.

This case is governed by the principles asserted in the decision in Piatt v. United States, 22 Wall. 496, 22 L. ed. 858.

The question is whether the payment was in fact made and accepted in satisfaction.

B. Co. v. United States, 105 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 1108, 111 U. S. 22, 28 L. ed. 341, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; Cape Ann Granite Co. v. United States, 20 Ct. Cl. 1.

Time was of the essence of the contract.

In the case of a government contract there is a special ground for insisting upon a construction which is in accordance with good faith, and which seeks no unconseionable advantage of the other party.

Scott v. United States, 12 Wall. 443, 20 L. ed. 438; Hume v. United States, 132 U. S. 406, 33 L. ed. 393, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 134.

Assistant Attorney General Pradt argued the cause and filed a brief for appellee:

The agreement not being in writing and signed by the parties, as required by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3744 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2510), was not a valid contract upon which an action can be brought for damages caused by the defendant's breach.

Clark v. United States, 95 U. S. 539, 24 L. ed. 518.

It is true that where services have been rendered, or goods delivered, under a contract within the statute of frauds, an action may be maintained on the quantum meruit as upon an implied contract, but only where the defendant is in default.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the court of claims dismissing the appellant's petition. 37 Ct. Cl. 281. The petition alleges a contract by the United States to buy 9,000,000 pounds of hay from the claimant at the rate of $.61½ per hundred weight, a refusal by the government to take the hay at the rate of one sixtieth daily, as required by the contract, according to the claimant's interpretation, and a failure to accept 255,291 pounds out of the 9,000,000. The rest, it is admitted, was taken and paid for at contract rates. The claimant seeks compensation for an increased price paid by it, increased cost of transportation, and loss of anticipated profits, caused by the delay, all as damages for the breach of the contract, or, alternatively, the market value of the hay less the amount paid by the United States. The answer is a general denial.

[162] The court of claims finds that during the late war with Spain an advertisement was published by a quartermaster for 9,000,000 pounds of hay, among other things, seemingly for *use in Camp George H. Thomas, Georgia, and that in connection with it the following information was furnished: "The foregoing are the estimated quantities which will be required, but bids will be accepted in whole or in part . . . and awards made under accepted bids will provide that the quantities awarded may be increased or decreased at the option of the United States, not exceeding 20 per centum thereof . . . and further, that if the troops should be wholly or in part withdrawn, the awards shall become inoperative to the extent of such reduction. . . . Hay and straw. . . . Deliveries of the supplies to begin within five days from date of award, and proceed at daily rates of at least one sixtieth of amount, or in such quantities and at such times afterwards, as may be designated by the chief quartermaster," etc. A bargain was made on these terms on July 12, 1898. Shipments were made, amounting, on August 27, 1898, to 4,685,949 pounds. On August 28 the quartermaster telegraphed to the claimant not to ship any more hay until notified to do so. This suspension of orders was due to the withdrawal of troops. The claimant then had 100 carloads in transit, which it was obliged to sell for what it could get, and protested against the stoppage. At different dates between September 12 and May 18 following the quartermaster telegraphed orders for hay, which were filled. Hay meantime had risen in value, and cost the claimant more than it would have cost in the summer. Accordingly, the claimant asked to be relieved from delivery, but the quartermaster refused, holding back money due to the claimant as security to compel performance. The claimant went on with deliveries, and in December was asking for orders "on our contract;" on April 27 returned a voucher "covering hay on our contract;" on May 27 sent a bill of lading and invoice "ordered upon our contract to-day;" and on June 24, 1899, wrote "We would like to know how soon you expect us to put in the balance of the hay due upon the contract, as we are anxious to get it all cleaned up." It would seem that no hay was ordered after June 13. The claimant *delivered the hay, and received full pay-[163] ment for it under the contract, without protest or attempt to reserve any rights at that time. The last payment was made on July 24, 1899. On May 11, 1899, however, the claimant wrote to the quartermaster, claiming damages on account of the government not taking the hay at the rate of one sixtieth per day, and on June 28, and later, the quartermaster approved the claim. Although, no doubt, both parties supposed their agreement binding, the court of claims held, and it is not disputed, that the contract was within Rev. Stat. § 3744 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2510), and not having been "reduced to writing, and signed by the contracting parties with their names at the end thereof," could not have been sued upon if it had not been performed. Clark v. United States, 95 U. S. 539, 24 L. ed. 518; South Boston Iron Co. v. United States, 118 U. S. 37, 30 L. ed. 69, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 928. See Monroe v. United States, 184 U. S. 524, 46 L. ed. 670, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444. It is argued by the claimant on this ground that it is entitled to maintain a quantum valebat.

On the facts stated it is evident that the claimant has no case. The invalidity of the contract is immaterial after it has been performed. When a lawful transfer of property is executed, it does not matter whether the terms of the execution were void or valid while executory; the transfer cannot be revoked or the terms changed. A promise to make a gift does not bind, but a gift cannot be taken back, and a transfer in pursuance of mutual promises is not made less effectual by those promises or by the fact that money was received in exchange. The contract may be void, as such, but it expresses the terms on which the parties respectively paid their money and delivered their goods. See Savage v. United States, 92 U. S. 382, 23 L. ed. 660. The proposition does not need to be argued or explained more at length. Of course, different considerations would come in if the claimant had been subjected to a motive from which it had a right to be free, as, for instance, by fraud or duress. But there was nothing which the law could recognize as duress, and the suggestion that it was peculiarly the duty of the officers of the government to see that *the[164] contract was put in binding form is very far from making out an analogy to fraud. The claimant was bound to know the law at its peril. The agent of the United States made no representation, and the claimant in no way purported to submit its judgment to his, if that would have bettered its case.

But it is said that this is not the simple case of mutual performance of a void contract, but that the United States, although it has paid the price, has broken the contract in respect of time. It may be said that if the United States, instead of paying for the hay, had set up the invalidity of the contract, the claimant could have sued on a quantum valebat. Clark v. United States, 95 U. S. 539, 542, 543, 24 L. ed. 518, 519; Bacon v. Parker, 137 Mass. 309, 310, 311. And it might be argued that the same result would follow if the United States, after paying the price, were compelled to rely upon the invalidity of the contract in answer to a claim of damages for a breach. Acceptance of payment by the vendor is not necessarily a waiver of such a claim. Garfield & P. Coal Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 166 Mass. 119, 123, 44 N. E. 119. But we need not consider the questions suggested, because we agree with the court of claims that there was no breach. The right to diminish the order, and to change the quantities and times, was reserved in the fullest and most express terms, and especially with regard to the event which happened,—the withdrawal of the troops. Therefore, if, in view of the protest and claim made by the claimant, we should assume that the payment of the contract price did not purport to be in full satisfaction of all claims under the contract, which would be going very far and would be against the findings, still there is no valid claim under it, because the United States has done all that it undertook to do. It is true that hay is an article varying greatly in price at different seasons of the year, and that would have been a reason for holding time of the essence, if the contract had fixed a time; but the contract left the time open, as we have said, and the claimant must be held to the bargain which it made, although it has been disappointed in reasonable hopes.

A taxpayer who admits that his own tax is correct cannot, on the ground that he will be deprived of his property without due process of law, and denied the equal protection of the laws, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, have a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court to review a construction by the supreme court of the state of the statutes thereof, as exempting in whole or in part certain corporations from the payment of taxes.

Decided November 16, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri to review a judgment quashing an alternative writ of mandamus to the state board of equalization. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward P. Johnson argued the cause, and, with Mr. William Preston Hill in propria persona and Mr. Frank K. Ryan, filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Edward C. Crow submitted the cause for defendants in error. Mr. Bruce Barnett was with him on the brief.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the supreme court of Missouri, upon a judgment quashing an alternative writ of mandamus to the state board of equalization. The petition alleges that the board, instead of assessing the total actual cash value of the taxable property of certain railroad, bridge, telephone, telegraph, and express companies, made pretended, fraudulent, inadequate, and not uniform assessments upon such property, at valuations varying from about a quarter to forty-eight *per cent of the actual [170] value, except that of the express companies, which they did not assess at all. It alleges that in this way the petitioner will be deprived of his property without due process of law and will be denied the equal protection of the laws, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The motion to quash denied the jurisdiction of the supreme court of Missouri to issue the writ, and also the sufficiency of the grounds on which the writ was allowed. The court sustained the motion without an opinion or statement of reasons.

For all that appears, the court may have quashed the writ on grounds of local practice. But if this consideration be laid on one side, it is impossible to say that the board of equalization has not acted with regard to those companies which it has assessed. It has laid a substantial tax upon them. Its judgment is final under the Missouri Constitution and statutes. Mo. Const. art. 10, § 18; Rev. Stat. §§ 9344, 9356, Stat. 1901, p. 232. If, nevertheless, we assume that mandamus would lie upon a clear case of fraud adequately alleged and proved (State Bd. of Equalization v. People, 191 Ill. 528, 539, 58 L. R. A. 513, 61 N. E. 339), it would be a strong thing to revise the judgment of the board on the strength of allegations of undervaluations, and the single adjective "fraudulent" without more specific allegations of fact. State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 165 Mo. 502, 516, 517, 65 S. W. 775; State ex rel. Folk v. Talty, 166 Mo. 529, 560, 66 S. W. 361; Manchester v. Furnald, 71 N. H. 153, 158, 51 Atl. 657; Knight v. Thomas, 93 Me. 494, 45 Atl. 499; Maish v. Arizona, 164 U. S. 599, 611, 41 L. ed. 567, 571, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 434, 438, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114. See Fogg v. Blair, 139 U. S. 118, 127, 35 L. ed. 104, 107, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 476.

However this may be, the petitioner admitted at the argument that his own tax was correct, and that he would have had no case under the 14th Amendment if the companies had been exempted altogether. Magon v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 293-295, 42 L. ed. 1037, 1043, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 562, 46 L. ed. 679, 690, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431. But his rights [171] under that amendment turn on the power of the state, no matter by what organ it acts. Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318, 25 L. ed. 667, 669. Therefore, if the supreme court of the state construed the statutes as exempting express companies from this tax, and substituting another, as it is argued on behalf of the defendants in error that the statutes do, the petitioner cannot complain here. For the legislature could exempt them, and the question whether it has done so or not is for the state courts to decide in their construction of its acts. Furthermore, if the state could grant a total exemption it could grant a partial exemption, and if it has done so, de facto, through its officers, the petitioner cannot come here on an allegation that the officers acted as they did without the authority of the state. That, again, is for the state court to decide. The petitioner has no case under the Constitution of the United States, and nothing else is open. This is a writ of error to a state court, so that questions under the state Constitution and laws cannot be considered, as they might be on error to a subordinate court of the United States.

Judgment affirmed.

PULLMAN'S PALACE CAR COMPANY.

(Sec S. C. Reporter's ed. 171-183.)

Commerce—privilege tax on sleeping-car companies.

1. Taxes exacted from a sleeping-car company engaged in both interstate and intrastate traffic, under a state statute imposing an annual tax of $500 per car upon sleeping-car companies doing business in the state, which makes no distinction between cars used in interstate traffic or in traffic wholly within the borders of the state, are void as an attempt by the state to impose a burden upon interstate commerce.
2. The annual tax of $3,000 imposed by a state statute upon sleeping-car companies which carry one or more local passengers on cars operating within the state is not void as a burden on interstate commerce, where the company is free to decline all local business if it sees fit.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee to review a judgment for the recovery from the state of Tennessee of moneys paid by a sleeping-car company for license taxes. Modified and remanded for further proceedings.

Statement by Mr. Justice Day:

This is a writ of error to review the judgment of the circuit court for the middle district of Tennessee in suits brought by the Pullman's Palace Car Company to recover from the state of Tennessee moneys paid under protest for taxes levied and collected by virtue of certain laws of the state requiring the payment of sums for the years 1887 to 1893, inclusive. These statutes are set forth in the opinion. The cases were tried to the court without the intervention of a jury, and separate findings of fact and law were made. From the findings of fact it appears that the Pullman Company, a sleeping-car company, operated its cars in Tennessee under a contract with railroad companies traversing the state. These contracts required the Pullman Company to furnish the cars, keep the same in order, and to hire the porters and conductors. The railroad companies paid the Pullman Company for the privileges afforded, furnishing light, heat, and water for the cars, and repairing damages due to accident and casualty. The special finding of facts as to the manner of operation in transporting the cars of the Pullman Company sets forth:

NOTE.—On corporate taxation as affected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.—see note to Sandford v. Poe, 60 L. R. A. 641.

[173] During the years 1887 and 1888 the company operated sleeping cars, as follows: A car left Nashville and went to Memphis nightly and on this car tickets were sold to passengers from Nashville to Memphis, and not beyond. This car remained in Memphis during the day, returning to Nashville the following *night, and going no further. The next night, it went from Nashville by way of Chattanooga to Atlanta, Georgia. It remained in Atlanta during the day, and returned the next night from Atlanta to Memphis. On the trip from Memphis tickets were sold from Nashville to Atlanta and to intermediate points in the state of Tennessee. On the nights the cars left Nashville for Memphis and Atlanta for Nashville, a car left Memphis for Nashville and another left Nashville for Atlanta, selling tickets from Memphis to Nashville and intermediate points, and no further, and from Atlanta and intermediate points to Nashville and no further. The car from Memphis to Nashville went on the trip to Atlanta before making a return trip to Memphis, and the car making the trip from Atlanta to Nashville went on the trip the following night to Memphis before making a return trip to Atlanta. The same cars were not used continuously in this service, but were changed from time to time, there being four cars performing the service at all times.

During the year 1887 the East Tennessee, Virginia, & Georgia Railroad Company ran two sleepers of its own, doing a business between Knoxville and Chattanooga, Tennessee. During the years 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893 the company has operated sleeping cars between Nashville and Memphis and Atlanta and Nashville, as above set forth. From 1887, continuously, the Pullman Company has operated its cars on the lines of the Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis Railway, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, East Tennessee, Virginia, & Georgia Railroad, now the Southern Railway, the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Railroad, Illinois Central Railroad, and Cincinnati Southern Railroad, and all other railroads within the state of Tennessee whereon sleeping cars are used, and has taken up, carried, and put down passengers within the state.

In 1887 sleeping cars were operated during a portion of the year between Nashville and Memphis, and did not pass beyond the limits of the state. It was agreed that, without either party waiving any rights, the plaintiff's claim would be abated $1,234.

*The gross receipts of the plaintiff per[174] year from lines running into the state of Tennessee was about $500,000. The gross receipts per year from passengers carried locally in Tennessee was about $25,000.

The cars actually used on all these lines during each year would number over one hundred.

Mr. John J. Vertrees argued the cause, and, with Mr. Charles T. Cates, Jr., filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

If the state of Tennessee is possessed of the power to impose this privilege tax the amount of the tax is a question for the legislature of Tennessee alone to decide. The only concern of this court is with the validity of the tax. All else lies beyond the jurisdiction which it has.

General words in an act should not be so construed as to give an effect to it beyond the legislative power, and thereby render the act unconstitutional; but, if it be possible, a construction shall be given to it that will render it free from constitutional objection. And the presumption is that the legislature intended to enact a law within its powers.

If a statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions, that one will be adopted which will avoid the effect of unconstitutionality, even though it may be necessary, for this purpose, to disregard the more usual or apparent import of the language employed.

Mr. William Burry argued the cause, and, with Mr. J. S. Runnells, filed a brief for defendant in error:

During all of the time covered by these different suits the business of the Pullman company was principally interstate business, and its business and the conduct of the same in Tennessee were exactly the same as that shown in Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635, and Pullman Southern Car Co. v. Nolan, 22 Fed. 276, which were there held to constitute interstate commerce.

Even if there had been cars running only between Nashville and Chattanooga, those cars would have run interstate, as the railroad passes into both Alabama and Georgia in going to Chattanooga. Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 187 U. S. 617, 47 L. ed. 333, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214.

There are sufficient modes in which the internal business, if not already taxed in some other way, may be subjected to taxation, without the imposition of a tax which covers the entire operations of the company.

Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 647, 32 L. ed. 314, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 136, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1383.

No state has the right to lay a tax on interstate commerce in any form, whether by way of duties laid on the transportation of the subjects of that commerce, or on the receipts derived from that transportation, or on the occupation or business of carrying it on.

State legislation which may operate as a burden on, or interfere with, interstate commerce is obnoxious to the Federal Constitution, and, inasmuch as this revenue act, joined to the duty imposed by law to accept passengers whenever they offer themselves, would act as such regulation of interstate commerce, it is clear that the act must be unconstitutional.

State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146.

After making the foregoing statement, Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

The taxes in controversy were levied under certain revenue laws of the state of Tennessee. Those for the years 1887 and 1888 provided: "That the rate of taxation on the [178]following *privileges shall be as follows: Sleeping cars: Each company doing business in the state, on each car, per annum, $500." Section eight of the act provided: "That any and all parties, firms, or corporations exercising any of the foregoing privileges must pay this tax, as set forth in this act, for the exercise of such privilege, whether they make a business of it or not."

The Tennessee act of 1877, imposing a tax upon the running of sleeping cars, was before this court for consideration in the case of Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635. That act provided: "That the running or using of sleeping cars or coaches on railroads in Tennessee, not owned by the railroads upon which they are run or used, is declared to be a privilege, and the companies shall be required to pay to the comptroller by the first day of July following fifty dollars ($50) for each and every said cars or coaches used or run over said roads; and if the said privilege tax herein assessed be not paid as aforesaid, the comptroller shall enforce the payment of the same by distress warrant."

It was held that the tax was a burden upon interstate commerce, and void because of the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce between the states. Unless the statute now under consideration can be distinguished from the one then construed, the Pickard Case is decisive of the present case. Both taxes were imposed under the power granted by the Constitution of Tennessee to lay a privilege tax. This power is held by the supreme court of the state to give a wide range of legislative discretion. Any occupation, business, employment, or the like, affecting the public, may be classed and taxed as a privilege. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115. In the act of 1877 the running and using of sleeping cars on railroads in the state, when the cars are not owned by the railroads upon which they are run, is declared to be a privilege. Under the act of 1887, the tax is specifically imposed upon a privilege. Under the act of 1877, the tax imposed was $50 for each car or coach used or run over the road. Under the act of 1887, each company doing upon railroads not owning the cars, and is precisely the privilege to be paid for under the first act, neither more nor less. In neither act is any distinction attempted between local or through cars or carriers of passengers. The railroads upon which the cars are run are lines traversing the state, but not confined to its limits. The cars of the Pullman Company run into and beyond the state as well as between points within the state. The act in its terms applies to cars running through the state as well as those whose operation is wholly intrastate. It applies to all alike, and requires payment for the privilege of running the cars of the company, regardless of the fact whether used in interstate traffic or in that which is wholly within the borders of the state. There is no decision of the supreme court of Tennessee limiting the act in its operation to intrastate traffic. It is true that the comptroller has sought to restrain the operation of the law by imposing the tax for two years upon cars running between Nashville and Memphis and between Nashville and Chattanooga for two years, and fixing one car in each year as the proportion of local business done on interstate cars for two years. But this action does not conclude the state in taxing for other years, and the action taken by the comptroller does not limit the terms of the law affecting interstate commerce.

In Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 647, 32 L. ed. 311, 314, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 136, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380, 1383, it was sought to recover a penalty imposed upon an agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company for failure to pay an annual license tax as required by an ordinance of Mobile. In the course of the opinion denying the right to exact the license fee, Mr. Justice Bradley said: "But it is urged that a portion of the telegraph *company's [180] business is internal to the state of Alabama, and therefore taxable by the state. But that fact does not remove the difficulty. The tax affects the whole business without discrimination. There are sufficient modes in which the internal business, if not already taxed in some other way, may be subjected to taxation, without the imposition of a tax which covers the entire operations of the company."

In Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 215, a license tax upon express companies was sustained, in view of the decision of the supreme court of that state that it affected only business of the company within the state. The statute now under consideration requires payment of the sum exacted for the privilege of doing any business, when the principal thing to be done is interstate traffic. We are not at liberty to read into the statute terms not found therein or necessarily implied, with a view to limiting the tax to local business, which the legislature, in the terms of the act, impose upon the entire business of the company. We are of opinion that taxes exacted under the act of 1887 are void as an attempt by the state to impose a burden upon interstate commerce.

Other considerations apply in the construction of the act of 1889, under which, or acts identical in terms, taxes were collected from 1889 to 1893, inclusive. It provides: "Sec. 4. The rate of taxation on the following privileges shall be as follows, per annum: . . . Sleeping car companies (in lieu of all other taxes except ad valorem tax) for one or more passengers taken up at one point in this state and delivered at another point in this state, and transported wholly within the state, per annum, $3,000." Its terms apply strictly to business done in the transportation of passengers taken up at one point in the state and transported wholly within the state to another point therein. It is not necessary to review the numerous cases in this court in which attempts by the states to control or regulate interstate commerce have been the subject of consideration. While they show a zealous care to preserve *the exclusive right of Congress to regulate interstate traffic, the corresponding right of the state to tax and control the internal business of the state, although thereby foreign or interstate commerce may be indirectly affected, has been recognized with equal clearness. In the late case of Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 215, Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the court, said: "It has never been held, however, that when the business of the company, which is wholly within the state, is but a mere incident to its interstate business, such fact would furnish any obstacle to the valid taxation by the state of the business of the company which is entirely local. So long as the regulation as to the license or taxation does not refer to, and is not imposed upon, the business of the company which is interstate, there is no interference with that commerce by the state statute."

Granting that the right exists whereby a state may impose privilege or license fees upon business carried on wholly within the state, it is argued that the tax of $3,000 per annum, collected for carrying one or more local passengers on cars operating within the state, is assessed upon traffic which bears such small proportion to the entire business of the company within the state that it could not have been levied in good faith upon purely local business, and is but a thinly disguised attempt to tax the privilege of interstate traffic. If the payment of this tax was compulsory upon the company before it could do a carrying business within the state, and the burden of its payment, because of the minor character of the domestic traffic, rested mainly upon the receipts from interstate traffic, there would be much force in this objection. Upon this proposition we are unable to distinguish this case from Pullman Co. v. Adams, 189 U. S. 420, 47 L. ed. 877, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494, decided at the last term, wherein it was held that the privilege tax imposed by the state of Mississippi, upon each car carrying passengers from one point in the state to another therein, was a valid tax, notwithstanding the fact that the company offered to show that its receipts from the carrying of the passengers named did not equal the *expenses chargeable against such receipts. This conclusion was based upon the right of the company to abandon the business if it saw fit. It was urged that under the Constitution of Mississippi the Pullman Company was a common carrier, required to carry passengers, and therefore could not be taxed for the privilege of doing that which it was compelled to do; but in view of a decision of the supreme court of Mississippi, sustaining the tax, it was assumed that no such objection existed under the state Constitution. Speaking upon this subject, Mr. Justice Holmes, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If the clause of the state Constitution referred to were held to impose the obligation supposed, and to be valid, we assume, without discussion, that the tax would be invalid. For then it would seem to be true that the State Constitution and the statute combined would impose a burden on commerce between the states analogous to that which was held bad in Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851. On the other hand, if the Pullman Company, whether called a common carrier or not, had the right to choose between what points it would carry, and therefore to give up the carriage of passengers from one point to another within the state, the case is governed by Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214. The company cannot complain of being taxed for the privilege of doing a local business which it is free to renounce. Both parties agree that the tax is a privilege tax."

There is additional reason for holding that the Pullman Company may transact its business in Tennessee without paying this privilege tax, and continue its interstate business, declining local business, thereby escaping the attempt to tax it upon business wholly within the state. The statute of Tennessee, enacted in 1875, provides: "The rule of the common law giving a right of action to any person excluded from any hotel or public means of transportation or place of amusement is hereby abrogated; and hereafter no keeper of any hotel or public house, or carrier of passengers for hire, or conductors, drivers, or employees of such [183] carrier or keeper, shall be bound *or under any obligation to entertain, carry, or admit any person whom he shall, for any reason whatever, choose not to entertain, carry, or admit to his house, hotel, carriage, or means of transportation, or place of amusement, nor shall any right exist in favor of any such person so refused admission, but the right of such keepers of hotels and public houses, carriers of passengers, and keepers of places of amusement, and their employees, to control the access and admission or exclusion of persons to or from public houses, means of transportation, and places of amusement, shall be as perfect and complete as that of any private person over his private house, carriage, or private theatre or places of amusements for his family." Shannon's Code, § 3046.

Under this act, no carrier is required to admit any passenger to his car or means of transportation. While the Pullman Company may not be technically a common carrier, still we think it comes within the scope and meaning of this act. A sleeping car is obviously a public means of transportation. Under this act, the carrier is not obliged to afford its privileges to those making application therefor. Mr. Justice Blatchford, speaking of the character of the service afforded by sleeping cars, in Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635, said: "The car was equally a vehicle of transit as if it had been a car owned by the railroad company, and the special conveniences or comforts furnished to the passenger had been furnished by the railroad company itself."

It follows that a tax imposed upon domestic business, under the circumstances shown, cannot be a burden upon interstate commerce in such sense as will invalidate it.

Under the judgment of the court below, the Pullman Company was permitted to recover for license taxes levied under both acts. In so far as it permitted a recovery for taxes under the act of 1889 and identical laws of other years, the judgment should be modified. For that purpose, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion, the case is remanded to the Circuit Court.

*DEFIANCE WATER COMPANY, Appt., [184] v.

CITY OF DEFIANCE and the Council of the City of Defiance.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 184-195.)

Federal jurisdiction—case arising under Federal Constitution and laws.

1. The assertion, in a bill filed by a water company against a municipality and its common council, that the obligation of the municipality's rental contract with the company was impaired by an ordinance which, while denying the validity of the contract, allowed a claim for rentals, with a saving clause to prevent estoppel, is too clearly unfounded to present a case arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, of which a Federal circuit court has jurisdiction without regard to the diversity of citizenship.
2. The averment that if a temporary injunction granted by an inferior state court, restraining the future payment of rentals accruing under the alleged contract of a municipality with a water company because of the invalidity of the contract, should ultimately be made perpetual, such company would thereby be deprived of its property without due process of law, does not justify a Federal circuit court in assuming jurisdiction of a suit by the water company to restrain the municipality from attempting to annul the rental contract, as being a case arising under the Federal Constitution or laws.

Argued April 22, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio to review a decree sustaining a plea of res judicata to a bill to enjoin the denial of the existence of a municipal contract with a water company or the abrogation or annulment of such contract. Reversed and remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

On the 4th day of January, 1898, the city of Defiance, a municipal corporation of the state of Ohio, by its solicitor, filed a bill in equity against the council of the city of Defiance *and the Defiance Waterworks [185] Company, in the court of common pleas of Defiance county, Ohio, praying that future payments under an alleged contract of August 17, 1887, between the council of the city and Bullock & Company, who had subsequently assigned it to the water company, for the furnishing of water to the city for the term of thirty years from the date of the contract, be enjoined because of the invalidity of said contract, on grounds set forth. A preliminary injunction was granted. The defiance Water Company thereupon presented its petition and bond for the removal of the case to the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, the petition alleging: "That this is a suit of a civil nature in which there is a controversy arising under the Constitution of the United States, in this especially, that by means of it the said plaintiff seeks to abrogate the contract alleged in its suit, and to deprive this defendant of its property, the amount alleged in said plaintiff's petition to be due this defendant, under said contract, without due process of law and without trial by jury; to which end and for which purpose the said council of the said city of Defiance have colluded and conspired with the said plaintiff, and it is by their said council's procurement that the said plaintiff has brought the said suit."

NOTE.—As to Federal question as conferring jurisdiction on United States courts—see notes to Montana Ore-Purchasing Co. v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 35 C. C. A. 7; Bailey v. Mosher, 11 C. C. A. 308; and Re Buchanan, 39 L. ed. U. S. 884.

The case was removed, but on January 24, 1898, was remanded by the circuit court of the United States to the court of common pleas. On the same day the water company filed its bill in the circuit court of the United States against the city of Defiance and the council of the city of Defiance, and complained that complainant was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Ohio for the purpose of operating waterworks in the city of Defiance, and thereby furnishing water to the city and to its citizens; that on January 4 the city brought the suit hereinbefore mentioned, and had obtained a preliminary injunction therein; that on August 17, 1887, the city of Defiance duly passed an ordinance entitled "An Ordinance to Authorize and Provide for the Construction and Maintenance [186] of a System of Waterworks in the *City of Defiance, Defiance County, Ohio," a copy of which ordinance was annexed. The provisions of the ordinance were then set forth, to the effect that by its terms the right and privilege for the period of thirty years thereafter was granted to Bullock & Company, their associates, successors, and assigns, to locate and operate a system of waterworks in that city, and to use the streets of the city for the purposes thereof; that the city contracted to rent of Bullock & Company a certain number of hydrants, and to pay a certain rental therefor; that the city, at the expiration of ten years, was given the right to purchase the system, or, if that was not then done, then at the expiration of five years thereafter.

It was averred that the ordinance was accepted by Bullock & Company, and the works were constructed, in the course of which Bullock & Company became indebted, and certain mortgage bonds were issued, which were outstanding and held by certain persons named; that Bullock & Company assigned all their rights and interests to the Defiance Water Company, and the water company completed the construction of the works to the entire satisfaction of the city, and the same were accepted March 5, 1889, by resolution.

The bill further averred that the city had used the hydrants and was still using them, and that it had paid all of the rentals claimed under the contract down to January 1, 1898, except the sum of $500 due in 1895, to recover which suit had been commenced. It was then alleged that the city council "at its regular meeting, January 7th, 1896, passed an ordinance or resolution in substance rescinding and annulling said contract of the city with the Defiance Water Company, your orator, so far as it had power so to do; and providing by the terms of said ordinance or resolution, by which it should allow the bill of said water company for the rents that had accrued to them from the said city for the last half of the year 1895, that the payment of the said bill should not be 'construed or taken to be any acknowledgment of any contract between them and the said city for said water rentals, or in any manner implying *any ae-[187]tual performance of any alleged contract, and that no further payment at the present rate be made to the said company.'"

The bill then stated that there was due to the water company for the last half of the year 1897 the sum of $3,142.50, less $756, which, it was subsequently said, had been paid. And it was charged, on information and belief, that the council and the several members of it had, ever since the passage of the resolution or ordinance of January 7, A. D. 1896, claimed, and repeatedly stated and given out to the public generally, that the city had no such contract as aforesaid for furnishing water to it by the water company; and that they had also passed resolutions and ordinances looking toward the construction of waterworks by the city, but nevertheless the city had given no notice of its intention to purchase, and had not offered to purchase, complainant's waterworks. And, furthermore, that many, if not all, of the members of the council combined, colluded, and confederated together and with the city solicitor, to procure him to institute the suit before mentioned, and to procure an order of injunction against themselves, the city council, prohibiting them from paying complainant the amounts due and owing. The bill then averred "that if said order of injunetion shall stand and be made perpetual the said city and council of Defiance, said defendants, will thereby deprive your orator of its property without due process of law, and by means of said order of injunction they will confiscate your orator's property and convert it to their own use, without payment therefor and without trial by jury, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States." And it was further averred "that the passage of said ordinance or resolution, and the attempt thereby to abrogate and annul said contract, contravenes the provisions of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, in this, that they are laws impairing the obligation of their said contract with your orator."

[188] The prayer was that an account might be taken of the amount *due complainant from the city of Defiance for water rents that may have accrued to it, and that the city and the city council be decreed and ordered to allow and pay the same; that a provisional or preliminary injunction be issued to restrain defendants from appropriating and diverting the moneys in the water fund to the payment of any other indebtedness than that due complainant; and that on final hearing the council and the city be perpetually enjoined from thereafter denying the existence of the contract, and abrogating or attempting to abrogate or annul the same; and for general relief.

The bill was subsequently amended, and a supplemental bill filed.

To the bill as amended defendants demurred for want of jurisdiction, among other grounds specially assigned, and the demurrers were overruled. Complainant then filed a supplemental bill, and to the amended and supplemental bills defendants filed a joint plea, with an answer in support thereof, insisting, among other things, that the court of common pleas of Defiance county had jurisdiction in the premises, and that the circuit court had not. The plea was overruled, and defendants answered, May 1, 1899, reserving their rights under their demurrers and plea; asserting the illegality of the alleged contract; insisting that complainant's bill was an attempt to secure a removal of the case from the state court to the circuit court, which had already been determined against complainant; denying the passage of any resolution or ordinance by the city council impairing or intended to impair the obligation of any contract with complainant or its assignors; and the performance of any act, or the intention to perform any act, toward the erection or construction of waterworks by the city; and submitting that the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and that it ought to refuse to further hear or consider the cause.

Defendants attached to their answer, as they did to their plea, a copy of the resolution of January 7, 1896, referred to in the bill, and also copies of sundry other ordinances or resolutions, *and denied that [189] that of January 7, 1896, or any other, had the effect, or was intended to have the effect, of impairing the obligation of the alleged contract with complainant; and insisted that if that, or any other resolution or ordinance, had the scope attributed to it, it was not lawfully passed under the statutes of Ohio; and, further, that such resolution or ordinance had been repealed by various subsequent resolutions or ordinances for the payment of rentals to complainant, copies of which were attached. Defendants disclaimed any reliance on or benefit from any or all said resolutions and ordinances as releasing or intending to release the city from the obligation of the alleged contract, or that they served any other purpose than as notice that defendants claimed the ordinance of 1887 was void and illegal from the beginning. Defendants denied combination or collusion in the institution of the suit in the state court, and averred that the city solicitor acted on his own volition.

Replication was filed, and evidence taken, and on June 17, 1901, defendants, by leave of court, filed a plea setting up the final decree of the circuit court of Defiance county, entered March 15, 1901, in the suit commenced in the court of common pleas, adjudging the alleged contract to be null and void, and perpetually enjoining the city of Defiance and the Defiance Water Company from carrying it out. Replication was filed to this plea, and a transcript of the record in the state courts was put in evidence. This showed that, after the case commenced in the court of common pleas was remanded to that court, a demurrer was filed to the petition, was sustained, and the petition dismissed, whereupon the case was carried to the circuit court of Defiance county by appeal. In that court the demurrer was overruled, the water company answered, the city replied, the case was heard on pleadings and evidence, and a final decree was rendered in favor of the city and against the water company and the city council to the effect above stated. The circuit court of the United States on hearing sustained defendants' plea and dismissed the bill. From that decree complainant prosecuted this appeal, which was *argued in this court April 22, [190] 1903. Thereafter, and on October 13, counsel for all the parties called the attention of the court to the fact that the case in the circuit court of Defiance county had been carried to the supreme court of Ohio by the water company, and that that court on June 16, 1903, had reversed the decree of said circuit court, sustained the demurrer to the petition, and directed it to be dismissed. 48 Ohio L. J. 687, 67 N. E. 1052. The supreme court held that, even if the alleged contract between the city and Bullock & Company were invalid, the cause of action to restrain its performance was barred by statute.

Messrs. Henry Newbegin and Robert Newbegin argued the cause, and, with Mr. Robert W. Bingham, filed a brief for appellant.

Messrs. Henry B. Harris and Fred L. Hay argued the cause, and, with Mr. John P. Cameron, filed a brief for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree of the circuit court was based on the decree of the state circuit court, which has been reversed by the state supreme court, and various suggestions have been made by counsel in respect of the judgment which they think should be rendered here in view of the termination of the litigation in the state courts.

But the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court meets us on the threshold, and the disposal of that question disposes of this appeal.

Diverse citizenship did not exist, and, unless the case was one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, the jurisdiction of the circuit court was not properly invoked, and should not have been maintained.

[191] We have repeatedly held that "when a suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy as to the *effect or construction of the Constitution or laws of the United States, upon the determination of which the result depends, it is not a suit arising under the Constitution or laws. And it must appear on the record, by a statement in legal and logical form, such as is required in good pleading, that the suit is one which does really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy as to a right which depends on the construction of the Constitution or some law or treaty of the United States, before jurisdiction can be maintained on this ground." Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ann Arbor R. Co. 178 U. S. 239, 44 L. ed. 1052, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867; Little York Gold-Washing & Water Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S. 199, 24 L. ed. 656; Blackburn v. Portland Gold Min. Co. 175 U. S. 571, 44 L. ed. 276, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222; Shreveport v. Cole, 129 U. S. 36, 32 L. ed. 589, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210; New Orleans v. 191 U. S.

Benjamin, 153 U. S. 411, 424, 38 L. ed. 764, 769, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905, 909.

In the case last cited we said:

"The judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, but these are cases actually, and not potentially, arising, and jurisdiction cannot be assumed on mere hypothesis. In this class of cases it is necessary to the exercise of original jurisdiction by the circuit court that the cause of action should depend upon the construction and application of the Constitution, and it is readily seen that cases in that predicament must be rare. Ordinarily the question of the repugnancy of a state statute to the impairment clause of the Constitution is to be passed upon by the state courts in the first instance, the presumption being in all cases that they will do what the Constitution and laws of the United States require (Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 108 U. S. 18, 27 L. ed. 636, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, 617); and if there be ground for complaint of their decision, the remedy is by writ of error under § 709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 575). Congress gave its construction to that part of the Constitution by the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. at L. 85, chap. 20], and has adhered to it in subsequent legislation."

Complainant rested its assertion of jurisdiction on two grounds:

1. That the resolution or ordinance of January 7, 1896, impaired the obligation of the contract created by the ordinance of August 17, 1887.

*2. That if complainant were perpetually [192] enjoined, as prayed in the suit in the state courts, the state would thereby have deprived it of its property without due process of law.

1. The bill did not set forth the resolution or ordinance of January 7, 1896, in extenso, but stated that by its passage the city council "in substance" rescinded and annulled the contract "so far as it had power so to do," in that in allowing a bill of the water company for accrued rentals it provided that the payment should not be "construed or taken to be any acknowledgment of any contract between them and the said city for said water rentals," . . .

The record shows the resolution, which was as follows:

"January 7th, 1896.

"A resolution to draw warrant in favor of water company for $3,160.

"Whereas, the Defiance Water Company have submitted a bill to the city council for $3,160, alleged to be due them from said city for water rental for the past six months; and

"Whereas, said council are of the opinion that no valid contract exists or is between said city and said company for the payment of the same; and, furthermore, that said bill is, in view of the deplorable inefficiency of the alleged water service, wholly without merit in reason and equity; and

"Whereas, the best interests of the city, in their opinion, demand that the present service be discontinued and immediate steps be taken for the purpose of supplying water to said city upon fair and equitable terms: therefore;

"Be it resolved, That the city clerk is hereby directed to forthwith draw his warrant on the city treasurer against the water fund of said city for the said sum of $3,160, in favor of said Defiance Water Company, in full payment of said bill; provided, however, that if said warrant be accepted by said company it be taken and accepted by them without thereby in any manner being construed or taken to be any acknowledgment of any contract between them and [193] said city for said water *rental, or in any manner implying any actual performance of any alleged contract, and that no further payments at the present rate be made to said company.

"Passed Jan. 7th, 1896."

Clearly, this resolution was not a law impairing the obligation of the contract. It was merely the allowance of a claim for rentals, with a saving clause to prevent estoppel; and the semiannual payments for 1896, and the first for 1897, were directed by subsequent ordinances to be made without any reservation.

And the city not only denies that the resolution (or any other) had or was intended to have the effect now attributed to it, but says that if this had been otherwise the resolution would have been invalid because not passed in accordance with the statutes of Ohio in that behalf.

The position of the city as disclosed by the record was, indeed, that no valid contract existed, and it was to test that question that the suit was instituted by the city solicitor in the court of common pleas; but there was no definitive legislative action taken by the city for the erection of its own waterworks, or otherwise, which was obnoxious to the prohibition of the Federal Constitution.

2. Nor does the contention that if the temporary injunction granted by the court of common pleas should ultimately be made perpetual justify the assumption of jurisdiction because of violation of the 14th Amendment.

Litigation in the state courts cannot be dragged into the Federal courts at such a stage and in such a way. The proposition is wholly untenable that, before the state courts in which a case is properly pending can proceed to adjudication in the regular and orderly administration of justice, the courts of the United States can be called on to interpose on the ground that the state courts might so decide as to render their final action unconstitutional.

Moreover, the state courts are perfectly competent to decide Federal questions arising before them, and it is their duty to *do [194] so. Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624, 637, 28 L. ed. 542, 546, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 160 U. S. 556, 583, 40 L. ed. 536, 543, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389.

And, we repeat, the presumption is in all cases that the state courts will do what the Constitution and laws of the United States require. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 108 U. S. 18, 27 L. ed. 636, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, 617; Shreveport v. Cole, 129 U. S. 36, 32 L. ed. 589, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 389, 26 L. ed. 567, 571; New Orleans v. Benjamin, 153 U. S. 411, 424, 38 L. ed. 764, 769, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905.

If error supervenes, the remedy is found in § 709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 575).

The present case strikingly illustrates the applicability of these well-settled principles. The preliminary injunction was dissolved by the court by which it was granted, and the city's suit was dismissed by the highest judicial tribunal of the state.

We regard this bill as an attempt to evade the discrimination between suits between citizens of the same state, and suits between citizens of different states, established by the Constitution and laws of the United States, by bringing into the circuit court controversies between citizens of the same state,—an evasion which it has been the constant effort of Congress and of this court to prevent (Bernards Twp. v. Stebbins, 109 U. S. 341, 353, 27 L. ed. 956, 960, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252; Shreveport v. Cole, 129 U. S. 36, 44, 32 L. ed. 589, 592, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210); and are of opinion that it should have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

The fundamental question of jurisdiction, first, of this court, and then of the court from which the record comes, presents itself on every writ of error or appeal, and must be answered by the court, whether propounded by counsel or not. Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 382, 28 L. ed. 462, 464, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; Metcalf v. Watertown, 128 U. S. 586, 32 L. ed. 543, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 173; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315, 32 L. ed. 690, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289; Continental Nat. Bank v. Buford, 191 U. S. 119, ante, 119, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54.

The circuit court having maintained jurisdiction on the ground that the case arose under the Constitution of the United States, and having proceeded to decree, the appeal was properly brought directly to this court, and it at once became our duty to inquire whether the circuit court should have retained the case. Having reached the result that the court erred in so doing, we are vested with the power to direct that conclusion to be carried into effect, and in its exercise we discharge one of our essential functions,—the determination of the jurisdiction of the courts below. Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315, 32 L. ed. 690, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289; Wetmore v. Rymer, 169 U. S. 115, 42 L. ed. 682, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 293; Aztec Min. Co. v. Ripley, 151 U. S. 79, 38 L. ed. 80, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236.

The bill was dismissed by the circuit court, but not for want of jurisdiction, and the decree will be reversed in order that the case may be disposed of on that ground, at the costs of appellant, which takes nothing by its appeal.

The decree is reversed at appellant's costs, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction.

Registered trade-marks—remedies for infringement—appeal—finality of decision of circuit court of appeals.

1. The remedies afforded by the act of March 3, 1881 (21 Stat. at L. 502, chap. 138, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3401) § 7, in case of the "wrongful use" of a trade-mark registered under that act as used in commerce with foreign nations or with the Indian tribes, are only available when the infringement of such trade-mark consists in the use of a counterfeit or imitation on goods intended for such commerce.
2. Averments in a bill which charge the infringement of a trade-mark registered under the act of March 3, 1881 (21 Stat. at L. 502, chap. 138, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3401) sufficiently invoked the jurisdiction of a Federal circuit court on the ground that the case arose under a law of the United States to deprive the judgment of the circuit court of appeals in the suit of that finality which would exist had jurisdiction depended entirely on diverse citizenship.

APPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit to review a decree which reversed a decree of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois enjoining the infringement of a registered trade-mark, and remanded the cause, with directions to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill. Affirmed.

See same case below, 50 C. C. A. 321, 112 Fed. 674.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

William R. Warner, a citizen of Pennsylvania, filed this bill against The Searle & Hereth Company, a corporation of Illinois, and Gideon D. Searle and others, citizens of Illinois, in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, alleging:

*That complainant "was the sole and exclusive owner and proprietor of, and had used in his business in Philadelphia and in commerce between the United States and foreign countries, and particularly with New South Wales and Victoria, a certain arbitrary and fanciful mark, termed Pancreopepsine, upon bottles and packages containing a certain medicinal preparation," and had sold large quantities thereof "throughout the United States and in commerce with foreign countries, and particularly in the cities of Philadelphia and Chicago;" and that the public generally had come to recognize packages and bottles so marked as containing the preparation manufactured by complainant.

That on December 26, 1882, complainant registered said trade-mark in the Patent Office, and obtained a certificate of registration according to law, a copy of which certificate and accompanying statement and declaration was attached. That defendants had, in violation of complainant's rights, "counterfeited, copied, and colorably imitated the trade-mark registered," and affixed the mark or symbol "to a medicinal preparation of the same general nature as that manufactured" by complainant, and had so closely imitated complainant's mark or symbol, and the manner of placing it on bottles and wrappers, that the public had been deceived into believing that the goods of defendants were those of complainant; "and that the said defendants, together and individually, have sold in the northern district of Illinois, and elsewhere, large quantities of the medicinal preparation intended for the cure of indigestion similar to that manufactured by your orator and contained in packages or bottles marked with the trade-mark or symbol heretofore referred to as belonging solely to your orator, or in such close imitation of your orator's trade-mark or symbol as has deceived the public, and led such public to believe the said mark or symbol designated the goods manufactured by your orator;" so that complainant's sales have been lessened, and profits lost.

[197] It was further averred that "the public in general, and particularly *the citizens of the northern district of Illinois, identify the article by the name, mark, or symbol; and that the spurious article manufactured and sold by the defendants associated with the same mark or symbol, or a mark or symbol in close imitation thereof, is a fraud and deception upon such of the citizens of the northern district of Illinois, and elsewhere, as purchase the same, believing it to be the genuine article manufactured by your orator, and thereby the public generally, and particularly the citizens of the northern district of Illinois, are damaged and misled."

Complainant prayed for an accounting; for damages; and for injunction.

Defendants in their answer denied that the word "Paneropepsine" was a proper subject for registration as a trade-mark; and charged that "if not deceptive it is purely descriptive, being a mere compound of the ordinary names of the ingredients, or the principal ingredients, contained in the medicinal compound, with the name of one slightly modified, and they deny, on information and belief, that the public have associated the said name with the goods manufactured by the complainant."

They averred that they were engaged in business in Chicago as general manufacturing chemists, and that they had, among other things, "put upon the market a medicinal compound having special merit as an aid of digestion, consisting, aside from the diluent, of nearly 40 per cent of pure pancreatin, about 50 per cent of pure pepsin, and a few other ingredients in relatively small proportions; that pancreatin and pepsin are well-known medicinal agents of recognized efficacy in promoting digestion, and have been mixed together for medicinal purposes for nearly or quite thirty years past; that they have designated their compound upon the labels of their bottles and packages 'Panero-Pepsin' in order that the nature of the compound may be expressed and its purpose as a digestive implied by the name; that they have put the said preparation in bottles and sold it upon the market both as [198] a powder and *in liquid form, the latter being designated 'Elixir Panero-Pepsin.'"

Defendants said that in adopting the name they had only followed common usage where it was desired that the name should be generally descriptive of the compound to which it was applied, and that their compound could not be more appropriately designated; and they denied that they had in any manner or way whatsoever copied or colorably imitated complainant's alleged trade-mark, or that they had at any time misled the public or any member thereof, into supposing that the panero-pepsin manufactured and sold by them was of complainant's manufacture, or that any person could have been so misled. And they averred that even if the name "Paneropepsine" could be the subject of a lawful trade-mark, which they denied, it had not been infringed by them.

Replication was filed, evidence taken, and hearing had. The circuit court held that complainant's contention touching unfair competition was not established, but that the trade-mark was valid and had been infringed, and granted an injunction.

The case was carried to the circuit court of appeals, and William R. Warner, Jr., executor, was made party in place of William R. Warner, deceased. The circuit court of appeals agreed that there was no proof establishing unfair competition; held that the monopoly claimed could not be sustained; and reversed the decree of the circuit court, and remanded the cause with directions to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill. 50 C. C. A. 321, 112 Fed. 674. From that decree this appeal was prosecuted, and argued on a motion to dismiss as well as on the merits.

Mr. Frank T. Brown argued the cause, and, with Mr. Samuel E. Darby, filed a brief for appellant.

Mr. Philip C. Dyrenforth argued the cause and filed a brief for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

In the Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, 25 L. ed. 550, it was ruled that the act of July 8, 1870 [16 Stat. at L. 210, chap. 230], carried forward into §§ 4937 to 4947 of the Revised Statutes, was invalid for want of constitutional authority, inasmuch as it was so framed that its provisions were applicable to all commerce, and could not be confined to that which was subject to the control of Congress. But Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said that the question "whether the trade-mark bears such a relation to commerce in general terms as to bring it within Congressional control, when used or applied to the classes of commerce which fall within that control, is one which, in the present case, we propose to leave undecided."

That decision was announced at October term, A. D. 1879, and on March 3, 1881, an act was approved entitled "An Act to Authorize the Registration of Trade-Marks, and

By its 1st section it was provided that "owners of trade-marks used in commerce with foreign nations, or with the Indian tribes, provided such owners shall be domiciled in the United States, or located in any foreign country or tribes which by treaty, convention, or law, affords similar privileges to citizens of the United States, may obtain registration of such trade-marks by complying with" certain specified requirements.

[203] By the 2d section, the application prescribed by the first "must, in order to create any right whatever in favor of the party filing it, be accompanied by a written declaration" "that *such party has at the time a right to the use of the trade-mark sought to be registered, and that no other person, firm, or corporation has the right to such use, either in the identical form or in any such near resemblance thereto as might be calculated to deceive; that such trade-mark is used in commerce with foreign nations or Indian tribes, as above indicated; . . ."

The 3d section provided that "no alleged trade-mark shall be registered unless the same appear to be lawfully used as such by the applicant in foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes as above mentioned, or is within the provision of a treaty, convention, or declaration with a foreign power; nor which is merely the name of the applicant; nor which is identical with a registered or known trade-mark owned by another and appropriate to the same class of merchandise, or which so nearly resembles some other person's lawful trade-mark as to be likely to cause confusion or mistake in the mind of the public, or to deceive purchasers."

By the 4th section certificates of registration of trade-marks were to be issued, copies of which, and of trade-marks and declarations filed therewith, should be evidence "in any suit in which such trade-marks shall be brought in controversy;" and by § 5 it was provided that the certificate of registry should remain in force for thirty years from its date, and might be renewed for a like period.

Sections 7, 10, 11, and 13 are as follows:

"Sec. 7. That registration of a trade-mark shall be prima facie evidence of ownership. Any person who shall reproduce, counterfeit, copy, or colorably imitate any trade-mark registered under this act, and affix the same to merchandise of substantially the same descriptive properties as those described in the registration, shall be liable to an action on the case for damages for the wrongful use of said trade-mark, at the suit of the owner thereof; and the party aggrieved shall also have his remedy according to the course of equity to enjoin the wrongful use of such trade-mark used in foreign commerce or *commerce with Indian tribes, as aforesaid,[204] and to recover compensation therefor in any court having jurisdiction over the person guilty of such wrongful act; and courts of the United States shall have original and appellate jurisdiction in such cases without regard to the amount in controversy."

"Sec. 10. That nothing in this act shall prevent, lessen, impeach, or avoid any remedy at law or in equity which any party aggrieved by any wrongful use of any trade-mark might have had if the provisions of this act had not been passed.

"Sec. 11. That nothing in this act shall be construed as unfavorably affecting a claim to a trade-mark after the term of registration shall have expired; nor to give cognizance to any court of the United States in an action or suit between citizens of the same state, unless the trade-mark in controversy is used on goods intended to be transported to a foreign country, or in lawful commercial intercourse with an Indian tribe."

"Sec. 13. That citizens and residents of this country wishing the protection of trade-marks in any foreign country, the laws of which require registration here as a condition precedent to getting such protection there, may register their trade-marks for that purpose as is above allowed to foreigners, and have certificate thereof from the Patent Office."

Obviously the act was passed in view of the decision that the prior act was unconstitutional, and it is, therefore, strictly limited to lawful commerce with foreign nations and with Indian tribes. It is only the trade-mark used in such commerce that is admitted to registry, and it can only be infringed when used in that commerce, without right, by another than its owner.

Reading the 7th, 10th, and 11th sections together, we find that the registration is prima facie evidence of ownership; that any person counterfeiting or colorably imitating any trade-mark registered under the act is liable, in the Federal courts, to an action on the case for damages for, and to injunction to restrain, its wrongful use; that is, the use of the *simulated mark in foreign com-[205] merce or with the Indian tribes; that the provisions of the act cannot operate to circumscribe any remedy which a party aggrieved by any wrongful use of any trade-mark might otherwise have had; and that the courts of the United States cannot take cognizance of an action on the case or a suit in equity between citizens of the same state, "unless the trade-mark in controversy is used on goods intended to be transported to a foreign country, or in lawful commercial intercourse with an Indian tribe."

Where diverse citizenship exists, and the statutory amount is in controversy, the courts of the United States have jurisdiction; but where those conditions do not exist, jurisdiction can only be maintained when there is interference with commerce with foreign nations or Indian tribes, and it is in such cases that the amount is declared by § 7 to be immaterial. The registered trade-mark must be used in that commerce, and is put in controversy by the use of the counterfeit or imitation on goods intended for such commerce, as prescribed by § 11.

We cannot concur in the view that the mere counterfeiting or imitating a registered trade-mark, and affixing the same, is the ground of the action on the case, in the Federal courts, given by § 7, for it is the wrongful use of the counterfeit or imitation that creates the liability at law, and justifies the remedy in equity. And the intent and object of the act forbid a construction that would bring local commerce within its scope.

In the present case, diverse citizenship, and requisite amount existed, and the circuit court, therefore, had jurisdiction; but it is argued that the jurisdiction depended entirely on diversity of citizenship, and hence that the decision of the circuit court of appeals was final. We think, however, that as infringement of a trade-mark registered under the act was charged, the averments of the bill, though quite defective, were sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction also [206] on the ground that the *case arose under a law of the United States, and will not, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

The bill was filed in February, 1898, and must be treated as alleging that the trade-mark was then in use in foreign or Indian commerce, although the proofs do not make out that fact after December 26, 1882.

The certificate of registry was good for thirty years as matter of evidence, but when it was sought to enjoin the wrongful use it should have been made to appear that the trade-mark was then being used in that commerce, and that that use was interfered with, without right, by defendant. And if the presumption of continuing use in such commerce flows from the registry, nevertheless, to make out infringement, it must appear that the alleged counterfeit or imitation was being used on merchandise intended to be transported to a foreign country or in lawful commercial intercourse with an Indian tribe.

We so held, in effect, in Ryder v. Holt, 128 U. S. 525, 32 L. ed. 529, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145, and we see no reason to depart from that ruling.

But the evidence in this record does not show that defendant used the name of its preparation on merchandise intended to be so transported, while the sales proved were sales in the city of Chicago and northern district of Illinois, and there is nothing to indicate that the preparation was intended to be used in foreign or Indian trade.

In short, even if it were assumed that there could be a trade-mark in the use of the word "Pancreopepsine," which would be invaded by the use of the word "Pancro-Pepsin," the circuit court could not, by virtue of the act, enjoin such use because it was not used in the commerce to which the act related.

Our conclusion does not require us to consider the question of the constitutionality of the act, which, it may be added, does not seem to have been raised in the courts below.

Decree affirmed.

Whenever the attention of the courts has been directed to the question of the validity of 3829, making it a criminal offense for a contractor for a public work to permit or require an employee to perform labor upon that work in excess of eight hours each day.

2. The equal protection of the laws is not denied to a contractor for a public work or his employees by the provisions of Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 3827-3829, making it a criminal offense for such contractor to permit or require an employee to perform labor upon the work in excess of eight hours each day.

Submitted May 1, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas to review a judgment which affirmed a conviction for a violation of the eight-hour law. Affirmed.

statutes regulating for all employments the hours of labor, they have denied the existence of legislative power, either absolutely to restrict the right to labor or employ labor to a prescribed time, or to compel extra compensation for overtime. On the other hand, regulations applicable only to specific employments are frequently, though not at all uniformly, sustained as a valid exercise of the police power to conserve the public health, and the courts are almost unanimous in sustaining the validity of such enactments as are designed to shorten the working hours of women and children. The right of freedom to contract is usually relied upon to defeat such statutes of this character as are not otherwise invalid as discriminative or class legislation. While it must be conceded that the right to contract is included in the constitutional guaranties designed to secure liberty and to protect property, it must also be admitted that such right, like the other rights protected by these guaranties, is not absolute, but is subject to regulation and limitation in the legitimate exercise of the police power. From an economic standpoint such measures may be objectionable, but the doctrine of laissez faire has not yet found its way into our Constitutions and it seems difficult to distinguish legislative regulation of hours of labor from the many undoubtedly valid restrictions upon the right to contract which have been made, either by statute, or by judicial application of the rules of public policy.

II. General regulations.

The constitutional right to contract is regarded as sufficient, in Low v. Rees Printing Co. 41 Neb. 127, 24 L. R. A. 702, 59 N. W. 362, to invalidate a statute limiting to eight hours a legal day's work for all classes of mechanics, servants, and laborers except those engaged in farm or domestic labor, and requiring for every hour's work in excess of that number double the pay of the preceding hour.

So, where a proposed legislative measure which provided that "eight hours shall constitute a legal day's work for all classes of mechanics, workmen, and laborers employed in any occupation in the state of Colorado" was submitted to the Colorado supreme court for an expression of opinion respecting its constitutionality, that court replied that such a law would violate the right of parties to make their own contracts guaranteed by the Colorado Bill 191 U. S.

See same case below, 64 Kan. 174, 67 Pac. 519.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas A. Pollock submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The term "liberty," as used in the 2d clause of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, guarantees the right to pursue any lawful calling or avocation, and to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, or essential to the carrying on of such calling or avocation.

of Rights, and protected by U. S. Const. 14th Amend. Re Eight Hour Law, 21 Colo. 29, 39 Pac. 328.

"Any statute," says Magruder, J., in Fiske v. People, 188 Ill. 206, 52 L. R. A. 291, 58 N. E. 985, "providing that the employer and laborer may not agree with each other as to what time shall constitute a day's work, is an invalid act."

So, in State v. McNally, 48 La. Ann. 1450, 36 L. R. A. 533, 21 So. 27, the court said that a municipal ordinance regulating the hours of labor generally within the city limits would undoubtedly be invalid.

Even if otherwise valid, an exception of persons engaged in farm and domestic labor from a statute limiting a legal day's work for mechanics, servants, and laborers to eight hours, and making the pay for every additional hour double that of the hour preceding, makes such statute unconstitutional as class legislation. Low v. Rees Printing Co. 41 Neb. 127, 24 L. R. A. 702, 59 N. W. 362.

III. Specific employments.

a. Mining and smelting.

A statute limiting the period of employment of laborers in underground mines to eight hours a day, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger, is a valid exercise of the police power, under Utah Const. art. 16, § 6, requiring the legislature to pass laws to provide for the health and safety of employees in factories, smelters, and mines, and does not deny the equal protection of the laws, or deprive anyone of liberty without due process of law. State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 71, sub nom. Holden v. Hardy, 37 L. R. A. 103, 46 Pac. 756, Affirmed in 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383.

The same is true of a statute limiting the period of employment of laborers in smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals to eight hours a day, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger. State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 96, sub nom. Holden v. Hardy, 37 L. R. A. 108, 46 Pac. 756, Affirmed in 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; Short v. Buillon-Beck & C. Mln. Co. 20 Utah, 20, 45 L. R. A. 603, 57 Pac. 720.

A different opinion is entertained by the Colorado supreme court, which, in answer to interrogatories propounded by the legislature, said

Rep. 652; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, 35 N. E. 62; State v. Peel Splint Coal Co. 36 W. Va. 856, 17 L. R. A. 385, 15 S. E. 1000.

"Due process of law" implies at least a conformity with natural and inherent principles of justice, and forbids that one man's property, or right to property, shall be taken for the benefit of another, or for the benefit of the state, without compensation, and that no one shall be condemned in his person or property without an opportunity of being heard in his own defense.

Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383.

The words "due process of law" and "the equal protection of the laws" had for centuries possessed a well-known signification that it is not competent for the legislature to single out the mining, manufacturing, and smelting industries of the state, and impose upon them restrictions with reference to the hours of their employees from which other employers of labor are exempt. Re Eight Hour Law, 21 Colo. 29, 39 Pac. 328.

And in a later case the same court held that a statute making it unlawful to work more than eight hours per day in mines and smelters unjustly and arbitrarily singled out a class of persons, and imposed upon them restrictions from which others similarly situated and substantially in the same condition were exempt. Re Morgan, 26 Colo. 415, 47 L. R. A. 52, 58 Pac. 1071. This statute, the court held to be such an infringement of a constitutional right to enjoy liberty and to acquire and possess property that it could not be justified as an exercise of the police power to protect the public health. The court refused to follow either State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 71, sub nom. Holden v. Hardy, 37 L. R. A. 103, 46 Pac. 756, or Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, supra, saying that the decision of the Utah supreme court in construing the Utah statute was not an authority, because the decision was based entirely upon the mandatory character of a provision of the Utah Constitution not present in the Colorado Constitution; and that, in affirming the judgment of the Utah court, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was not a precedent in the case at bar, because the sole question before the Federal court was whether or not the Utah act violated the Federal Constitution, and that it might well be the case that a law is valid so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, and yet run counter to an express inhibition of a state Constitution.

b. Laundries.

A municipal ordinance prohibiting laundry operations within certain prescribed territorial limits from 10 P. M. until 6 A. M. is not obnoxious to U. S. Const. 14th Amend. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730.

c. Railroads.

The authority of a state legislature to prohibit railway companies from requiring certain of its employees who have been at work for which became a part of the Constitution. They are synonymous with "the law of the land." They mean a law binding upon every member of the community under similar circumstances.

Wally v. Kennedy, 2 Yerg. 554, 24 Am. Dec. 511.

They were intended to secure the individual from arbitrary exercise of the powers of the government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice.

Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 235, 4 L. ed. 599.

They condemn arbitrary, unequal, and partial legislation.

State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789, 22 S. W. 351.

twenty-four consecutive hours again to go on duty until they have had at least eight hours rest was said, in Wheeling Bridge & Terminal R. Co. v. Gilmore, 8 Ohio C. C. 658, to be undoubted.

Such a statute would seem clearly to be sustainable because of the direct interest which the public has in seeing that the safety of the human freight intrusted to the railway companies should not be imperilled by the employment of other than alert and unwearied employees.

But the constitutional guaranties of liberty of action, the security of property, and the equal protection of the laws have been held to be infringed by the absolute prohibition of a state statute against employing certain classes of railway employees more than ten hours per day unless given extra pay for overwork. Wheeling Bridge & Terminal R. Co. v. Gilmore, 8 Ohio C. C. 658.

To the contrary is Re Ten-Hour Law for Street Railway Corporations (R. I.) 61 L. R. A. 612, 54 Atl. 602, which holds that the legislature may, under the police power, properly prohibit the employment of street-railway employees for more than ten hours within the twenty-four hours of the natural day, to be performed within twelve consecutive hours. And such statute is not rendered arbitrary, partial, or oppressive because it exempts from its operation cases of existing written contracts.

d. Bakeries.

A statute prohibiting employment in bakeries or confectionery establishments for more than sixty hours a week, or more than ten hours a day, unless for the purpose of making a shorter work day on the last day of the week, is a valid exercise of the police power to protect the public health. People v. Lochner, 177 N. Y. 145, 69 N. E. 373.

But see infra, III. e.,—People v. Orange County Road Constr. Co. 175 N. Y. 84, 67 N. E. 129.

e. Public work.

A sharp conflict exists as to the validity of statutes similar to the one upheld in Atkin v. Kansas. In addition to the decision of the Kansas supreme court in this case (State v. Atkin, 64 Kan. 174, 67 Pac. 519), the Kansas eight-hour law being limited to persons employed by the state, or by any of its political subdivisions, had previously been sustained in

They mean, not only that the means which the laws afford for such security shall be equally accessible to him, but that no one shall be subject to any greater burdens or charges than such as are imposed upon all others under like circumstances.

Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 9 Sawy. 165, 18 Fed. 398.

The 14th Amendment suffers no other or greater burdens or charges to be laid upon one than such as are equally borne by others.

Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 25 L. ed. 676; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 359.

Classification must have some reasonable basis. The differences which will support class legislation must be such as, in the nature of things, furnish a reason for separate laws. Arbitrary designation is not classification.

Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439; State ex rel. Richards v. Hammer, 42 N. J. L. 438; Ayars's Appeal, 122 Pa. 266, 2 L. R. A. 577, 16 Atl. 363.

The legislature is not the sole judge as to whether or not a classification is necessary and proper.

State ex rel. Pell v. Newark, 40 N. J. L. 79; Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383.

The arbitrary and unreasonable classification which is made the basis of the legis-

Re Dalton, 61 Kan. 257, 47 L. R. A. 380, 59 Pac. 336, as a mere direction of the state to its agents. "The position which the state has taken," said Smith, J., in "nowise differs from that of an individual who, in the employment of labor, refuses to permit his employees to labor more than eight hours. . . . Whatever orders the state may give directly to its own agents, it may require of its political subdivisions,—instrumentalities of said government, such as counties, cities, and townships."

So, a statute providing that in contracting for work to be done for the city of Buffalo the contractor shall bind himself not to accept more than eight hours as a day's work, to be performed within nine consecutive hours, or, except in case of necessity, to employ anyone for more than eight hours in twenty-four consecutive hours, does not violate either the Federal or the New York Constitution. People v. Warren, 77 Hun, 120, 28 N. Y. Supp. 303; People ex rel. Warren v. Beck, 10 Misc. 77, 30 N. Y. Supp. 473, Reversed on other grounds in 144 N. Y. 225, 39 N. E. 80. But see, infra, People v. Orange County Road Constr. Co. 175 N. Y. 84, 67 N. E. 129.

These seem to be the only decisions upholding the validity of such legislation, although some importance might be given to the language of McEnery, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in State v. McNally, 48 La. Ann. 1450, 36 L. R. A. 533, 21 So. 27, where, in holding invalid a municipal ordinance regulating the hours of labor on public works because it made a violation of its provisions an indictable offense which the general assembly alone can create, he said: "The city has the absolute control of its own property, and can regulate the hours of work to be employed on the same. The ordinance violates no law so far as it designates the number of hours in which laborers may be employed on public works."

On the other hand, a municipal ordinance making it a misdemeanor for any contractor, when having labor performed for the purpose of carrying out a contract with the city, to demand, receive, or contract for more than eight hours' labor in one day has been held to be void as a direct infringement of the rights of persons engaged in a lawful business to make and enforce their contracts. Ex parte Kuback, 85 Cal. 274, 9 L. R. A. 482, 24 Pac. 737. And an ordinance almost identical in its terms was likewise held invalid in Seattle v. Smyth, 22 Wash.

327, 60 Pac. 1120, as an interference with the constitutional right of freedom to contract.

The Ohio statute limiting to eight hours per day the work of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed on behalf of the state or any political subdivision thereof, and requiring every contract for public work to contain a stipulation to that effect, penalizing its violation, and making noncompliance a misdemeanor, abridges the right of contract, and invades the right of liberty and property, and is not sustainable as a valid exercise of the police power, because it does not appear that the services to be performed were unlawful or against public policy, or that they were of such character that such limitation was necessary to the public welfare. Cleveland v. Clements Bros. Constr. Co. 67 Ohio St. 197, 59 L. R. A. 775, 65 N. E. 885. To the contention upheld in Re Dalton, 61 Kan. 257, 47 L. R. A. 380, 59 Pac. 336, supra, and indorsed in ATKIN V. KANSAS, that the statute is only in the nature of a direction by a principal to his agent, and therefore within the legislative authority, the court replied that the fallacy of this argument lay in the unfounded assumption that the compulsory authority of the legislature over municipal corporations is so absolute and arbitrary that it may dictate the specific terms upon which such municipality shall contract, and may prescribe what stipulations and conditions its contracts shall contain, although such contracts may, as in this case, relate only to matters of local improvement. Further, the court said such statute was much more than a mere direction by a principal to an agent, and that its provisions applied, not only to officers and agents of the state, but, with equal force, to all persons who would enter into contracts with the state or any of its political subdivisions, and undertook to limit and restrict such persons in their right to contract by prohibiting the making of contracts for a day's work of more than eight hours.

The provision of N. Y. Penal Code, § 384h, subd. 1, making it a criminal offense for any person or corporation contracting with the state or a municipal corporation to require more than eight hours' work for a day's labor, was condemned in People v. Orange County Road Constr. Co. 37 Misc. 341, 75 N. Y. Supp. 510, on a demurrer to an indictment for its violation, as an unconstitutional interference with the rights of the individual. On appeal to the appellate division of the New York supreme court, the judglation under consideration is forcibly pointed out in many recent decisions, some of them being based upon statutes almost identical with that under consideration.

R. A. 154, 66 N. E. 895.

The argument that a contractor's rights are not infringed because he is at liberty to bid or not to bid, as he may see fit, for ment of the lower court was reversed, and the validity of the enactment sustained on the authority of People v. Warren, 77 Hun, 120, 28 N. Y. Supp. 303, which the court said was the only authoritative expression of opinion by the supreme court on this question. People v. Orange County Road Constr. Co. 73 App. Div. 580, 77 N. Y. Supp. 16. When this case reached the New York court of appeals Cullen, J., in an opinion concurred in by a bare majority of the court, said that the statute could not be upheld as an exercise of the police power because of the arbitrary distinction drawn between persons contracting with the state and other employers; that the enactment could not be sustained because the work to be done was state work, for the manner of performance of which the legislature might prescribe rules, because the act applies to independent contractors, and no such right of regulation exists where the state has let out the performance of the work to a contractor, unless it is reserved in the contract; and that, assuming that a statute might be upheld which purported to punish criminally the violation by a contractor of his contractual obligation assumed because of the provisions of the labor law (N. Y. Laws 1897, chap. 415, § 3, as amended by Laws 1899, chap. 567), requiring municipal or state contracts to contain an eight-hour stipulation, the statute in question does not assume to punish an offender against its provisions because he has violated any contract, but solely because he has required more than eight hours' labor regardless of the terms and conditions of the contract. 175 N. Y. 84, 67 N. E. 129. The force of these observations as furnishing an authoritative precedent is materially weakened because of the fact that the judge goes on to say that, assuming that the statute can be upheld as one inflicting punishment for the wilful violation of a contract, and that the statute ex proprio vigore imported into every contract subsequently made an agreement by the contractor not to require more than eight hours' work a day from his employees, the indictment was fatally defective for failure to state that the contract therein referred to was made subsequent to the enactment of the statute. On this point, which clearly is sufficient to sustain the decision reversing the order appealed from and sustaining the demurrer to the indictment, all the judges, except Haight, J., dissenting, concurred. Indeed, the dissentient judge thought that the constitutional question was not decided at all in this case, as appears from this language from his dissenting opinion: "The question discussed upon the argument of this appeal was the constitutionality of the eight-hour clause of the statute. This was the question raised by the demurrer, and I think it should now be decided by this court. If questions other than this are to be now determined then I think a reargument should be ordered so that the court may have the aid to be derived from a careful discussion of the questions by counsel."

IV. Women and children.

Statutes restricting the hours of labor for women and children have, with one exception, been sustained. The leading case is Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 120 Mass. 383, where a statute prohibiting the employment of any woman or minor under eighteen years of age in a manufacturing establishment for more than ten hours per day, except in certain cases, and in no case for more than sixty hours per week, was sustained as a valid health and police regulation.

An enactment of the Pennsylvania legislature making it a penal offense to employ minors or females in any manufacturing establishment, mercantile industry, laundry, workshop, renovating works or printing office for more than twelve hours a day or sixty hours a week was upheld in Com. v. Beatty, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 5, as a valid exercise of the police power.

A statute forbidding the employment of females in mechanical or mercantile establishments, laundries, hotels, and restaurants more public work, would justify any discrimination in which a legislature might see fit to indulge.

than ten hours a day does not deprive them of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 59 L. R. A. 342, 70 Pac. 52.

The Nebraska statute restricting the hours of labor for females in manufacturing, mechanical, and mercantile establishments, hotels, and restaurants to a maximum of sixty hours a week and ten hours a day is a legitimate exercise of the police power, and does not violate the constitutional guaranties of the personal and property rights of either employer or employee. Wenham v. State (Neb.) 58 L. R. A. 825, 91 N. W. 421. And such statute is not unconstitutional as special or class legislation, since the law applies alike to all women who shall engage in labor in any of the establishments mentioned. Ibid.

The contrary view is strongly upheld in Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, 40 N. E. 454, where a statute prohibiting the employment of females in any factory or workshop more than eight hours a day is held to be unconstitutional as partial and discriminating in its character, whether applying only to manufacturers of wearing apparel and like articles, or as applying to manufacturers of all kinds of products; and is further declared to be invalid as a purely arbitrary restriction upon the fundamental right of the citizen to control his or her own time and faculties, and a substitution of the legislative judgment for that of the employer and employee in a matter about which they are competent to agree with each other. To the contention that such statute was a proper exercise of the police power for the promotion of the public health on the ground that it is designed to protect women on account of their sex and physique, the court replied that sex is no bar, under the Illinois Constitution or laws, to the right to contract; that the mere fact of sex will not justify the exercise of the police power for the purpose of limiting the exercise of such rights by a woman, unless there is some fair, just, and reasonable connection between such limitation and the public health, safety, and welfare; and that there is no reasonable ground why a woman should be deprived of the right to determine for herself how many hours each day she can and may work in an employment conceded to be lawful in itself and suitable for her to engage in, even if the police power can be exercised to prevent injury to the individual engaged in a particular calling, which the court regarded as questionable. Referring to Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 120 Mass. 385, supra, the court said that such decision was evidently made in view of the large discretion vested by the Massachusetts Constitution in the legislative branch of the government to enact such statutes as it should judge to be for the "good and welfare of the commonwealth," and that it was said therein that the act might be maintained as a health or police regulation, because the legislature deemed the employment of manufacturing dangerous to health. The court added: "But the Massachusetts case is not in line with the current of authority, as it assumes that the police power is practically without limitation. As has already been stated, the legislature cannot so use that power as to invade the fundamental rights of the citizen; and it is for the courts to decide whether a measure which assumes to have been passed in the interest of the public health really 'relates to, and is convenient and appropriate to promote, the public health.'"

V. Sunday laws.

No attempt has here been made to collate the authorities respecting the validity of laws restricting labor on Sunday. The constitutionality of Sunday laws generally is discussed in a note to Judefind v. State, 22 L. R. A. 721.

What is and what is not unlawful Sunday labor are considered in a note to Quarles v. State, 14 L. R. A. 192.

The prohibition of Sunday sports or games is the title of a note to State v. O'Rourke, 17 L. R. A. 830.

The provisions of the statute, in so far as they limit the hours of employment on public work, have no relation whatsoever to the public health, safety, or morals, and cannot be held valid as a police regulation.

Statutes regulating the hours of labor have been upheld as an exercise of the police power of the state in three classes of cases: (1) Occupations injurious to the health of employees; (2) occupations in which women and children are employed; (3) occupations involving the public safety and welfare.

Branson v. Philadelphia, 47 Pa. 329; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Shawnee County, 28 Kan. 431.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves the validity under the Constitution of the United States of the statute known as the eight-hour law of Kansas of 1891, chap. 114, being §§ 3827, 3828, and 3829 of the General Statutes of 1901 of that state.

By the 1st section of that act it was provided that "eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, *me-[208]chanics, or other persons now employed, or who may hereafter be employed by or on behalf of the state of Kansas, or by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality of said state, except in cases of extraordinary emergency which may arise in time of war, or in cases where it may be necessary to work more than eight hours per calendar day for the protection of property or human life: provided, that in all such cases the laborer, workmen, mechanics, or other persons so employed and working to exceed eight hours per calendar day shall be paid on the basis of eight hours constituting a day's work: provided further, that not less than the current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed shall be paid to laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons so employed by or on behalf of the state of Kansas, or any county, city, township, or other municipal of said state; and laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons employed by contractors or sub-contractors in the execution of any contract or contracts within the state of Kansas, or within any county, city, township, or other municipality thereof shall be deemed to be employed by or on behalf of the state of Kansas or of such county, city, township, or other municipality thereof."

The 2d section declared that "All contracts hereafter made by or on behalf of the state of Kansas, or by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality of said state, with any corporation, person, or persons, for the performance of any work or the furnishing of any material manufactured within the state of Kansas, shall be deemed and considered as made upon the basis of eight hours constituting a day's work; and it shall be unlawful for any such corporation, person, or persons to require or permit any laborer, workman, mechanic, or other person to work more than eight hours per calendar day in doing such work or in furnishing or manufacturing such material, except in the cases and upon the conditions provided in § 1 of this act."

[209] The 3d section makes any officer of Kansas, or of any *county, city, township, or municipality of that state, or any person acting under or for such officer, or any contractor with the state, or any county, city, township, or other municipality thereof, or other person violating any of the provisions of the act, liable for each offense, and subject to be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

It may be stated that the act exempts existing contracts from its provisions.

The present prosecution was under the above act, and was commenced in one of the courts of Kansas.

The complaint in its first count charged that Atkins contracted with the municipal corporation of Kansas City to do the labor, and furnish all materials for the construction of a brick pavement upon Quindaro boulevard, a public street of that city; and having hired one George Reese to shovel and remove dirt in execution of the work, did knowingly, wilfully, and unlawfully permit and require him to labor ten hours each calendar day upon said work; there being no extraordinary emergency arising in time of war, nor any necessity for him to labor more than eight hours per day for the protection of property or of human life.

The 2d count contained the same allegations as to the general nature of Atkins's contract, and charged that he unlawfully hired Reese to labor on the basis of ten hours as constituting a day's work by contracting to pay the current rate of wages, which in that locality was the sum of $1.50 per day, and unlawfully exacted and required of him that he labor ten hours each calendar day in order to be entitled to the current wages of $1.50 per day, there being no extraordinary emergency arising in time of war, nor any necessity for him to labor more than eight hours for the protection of property or of human life.

The defendant moved to quash each count, upon the grounds, among others, that the statute in question, in violation of the *1st section of the 14th Amendment to the [210] Constitution of the United States, deprived him of his liberty and property without due process of law, and denied him the equal protection of the laws.

The motion to quash was overruled, and the case was heard upon an agreed statement of facts.

It appears from that statement that the parties stipulated, for the purposes of the case, that Kansas City was under a duty to keep its streets and highways in repair, and make all contracts to grade and pave them and for all other public improvements within its limits; that the defendant entered into a contract with the city to construct a pavement on Quindaro boulevard, a public highway in that city, and employed, among others, one George Reese to perform the labor of shoveling and removing dirt in the prosecution of that work; permitted him to work more than eight hours on each calendar day, although there was no extraordinary emergency arising in time of war, nor any necessity that he or any other person engaged on the work should work more than eight hours for the protection of property or human life; that the agreement with Reese was to pay $.15 per hour, and no more, the current rate of wages for such work in that locality being $1.50 for ten hours' labor per day; and that the defendant exacted and required of him that he work ten hours each calendar day, in order to be entitled to the current wages of $1.50 per day; that if the contractor had been compelled to pay Reese and other laborers at the rate of $1.50 per day for eight hours' work, his compensation would have been diminished by $100; that Reese was not compelled, required, or requested to work more than eight hours in any one day, but did so voluntarily, and was permitted and allowed to work ten hours in each calendar day in order to earn $1.50 in a calendar day; that he was employed at his own solicitation, and entered into the agreement with Atkin freely, and worked at the time and place mentioned in the complaint with the knowledge, consent, and permission [211] of defendant; that it was not the *intention, expectation, desire, or agreement of Reese or of the defendant that the former should ask, demand, or receive the same compensation for eight hours' work as was paid for ten hours' work each calendar day to laborers doing the same kind of work for persons having contracts with private persons or corporations; that he was hired and employed without the knowledge or consent of the city, and neither the city nor its officers had or exercised any control or supervision over him, he being the servant of the defendant, and not of the city; and that the contract between the defendant and the city did not contain any provision as to the number of hours laborers should work in a calendar day, nor any provision as to their compensation, but left the contractor free as to the means and manner of performing his contract.

It was also stipulated that the labor performed by Reese was healthful outdoor work, not dangerous, hazardous, or in any way injurious to life, limb, or health, and could be performed for a period of ten hours during each working day of the week without injury from so doing, and that the labor he was employed to perform, and did perform, "was in no respect or manner more dangerous to the health or hazardous to life or limb or to the general welfare of the said George Reese or other persons doing such work than the labor performed by persons doing the same kind of or character of work as the employees or [of] contractors having contracts to do the same kind of work for private persons, firms, or corporations, or as the servants of private persons, firms, or corporations."

It was further stipulated that the work of shoveling and removing dirt in the construction of a pavement was in all respects the same whether the pavement be constructed for a city or other municipality or for a private person, firm, or corporation.

Such was the case presented for the determination of the trial court.

The prosecution resulted in a judgment against the defendant, and he was sentenced to pay a fine of $50 on each *count of the [212] complaint. Motions in arrest of judgment and for new trial having been denied, the case was taken to the supreme court of Kansas, which affirmed the judgment, and sustained the validity of the statute.

The case has been stated quite fully, in order that there may be no dispute as to what is involved and what not involved in its determination.

No question arises here as to the power of a state, consistently with the Federal Constitution, to make it a criminal offense for an employer, in purely private work in which the public has no concern, to permit or to require his employees to perform daily labor in excess of a prescribed number of hours. One phase of that general question was considered in Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, in which it was held that the Constitution of the United States did not forbid a state from enacting a statute providing—as did the statute of Utah there involved—*that in [219] all underground mines or workings and in smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals, the period of the employment of workmen should be eight hours per day, except in cases of emergency, when life or property is in imminent danger. In respect of that statute, this court said: "The enactment does not profess to limit the hours of all workmen, but merely those who are employed in underground mines, or in the smelting, reduction, or refining of ores or metals. These employments, when too long pursued, the legislature has judged to be detrimental to the health of the employees, and so long as there are reasonable grounds for believing that this is so, its decision upon this subject cannot be reviewed by the Federal courts. While the general experience of mankind may justify us in believing that men may engage in ordinary employments more than eight hours per day without injury to their health, it does not follow that labor for the same length of time is innocuous when carried on beneath the surface of the earth, where the operative is deprived of fresh air and sunlight, and is frequently subjected to foul atmosphere and a very high temperature, or to the influence of noxious gases, generated by the processes of refining or smelting."

As already stated, no such question is presented by the present record; for the work to which the complaint refers is that performed on behalf of a municipal corporation, not private work for private parties. Whether a similar statute applied to laborers or employees in purely private work would be constitutional is a question of very large import, which we have no occasion now to determine or even to consider.

Assuming that the statute has application only to labor or work performed by or on behalf of the state, or by or on behalf of a municipal corporation, the defendant contends that it is in conflict with the 14th Amendment. He insists that the Amendment guarantees to him the right to pursue any lawful calling, and to enter into all contracts that are proper, necessary, or essential to the prosecution of such calling; and [220] that the statute of Kansas unreasonably interferes with the exercise of that right, thereby denying to him the equal protection of the laws. Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 832, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427; Williams v. Fears, 179 U. S. 270, 45 L. ed. 186, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128. In this connection, reference is made by counsel to the judgment of the supreme court of Kansas in Ashby's Case, 60 Kan. 101, 106, 55 Pac. 336, in which that court said: "When the eight-hour law was passed, the legislature had under consideration the general subject of the length of a day's labor for those engaged on public works at manual labor, without special reference to the purpose or occasion of their employment. The leading idea clearly was to limit the hours of toil of laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons in like employments, to eight hours, without reduction of compensation for the day's services."

"If a statute," counsel observes, "such as the one under consideration is justifiable, should it not apply to all persons and to all vocations whatsoever? Why should such a law be limited to contractors with the state and its municipalities? . . . Why should the law allow a contractor to agree with a laborer to shovel dirt for ten hours a day in performance of a private contract, and make exactly the same act under similar conditions a misdemeanor when done in the performance of a contract for the construction of a public improvement? Why is the liberty with reference to contracting restricted in the one case and not in the other?"

These questions—indeed, the entire argument of defendant's counsel—seem to attach too little consequence to the relation existing between a state and its municipal corporations. Such corporations are the creatures—mere political subdivisions—of the state, for the purpose of exercising a part of its powers. They may exert only such powers as are expressly granted to them, or such as may be necessarily implied from those granted. What they lawfully do of a public character is done under the sanction of the state. They are, in every essential sense, only auxiliaries of the state for the purposes of local government. They may be created, or, having been *created, their powers may be re-[221] stricted or enlarged or altogether withdrawn at the will of the legislature; the authority of the legislature, when restricting or withdrawing such powers, being subject only to the fundamental condition that the collective and individual rights of the people of the municipality shall not thereby be destroyed. Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. 654; 663, 18 L. ed. 79, 82; United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 Wall. 322, 328-9, 21 L. ed. 597, 600; Mt. Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 525, 25 L. ed. 699, 701; Piqua Branch of State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369, 380, 14 L. ed. 977, 981; Hill v. Memphis, 134 U. S. 198, 203, 33 L. ed. 887, 889, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 562; Barnett v. Denison, 145 U. S. 135, 139, 36 L. ed. 652, 653, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 819; Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 310, 42 L. ed. 1047, 1049, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617. In the case last cited we said that "a municipal corporation is, so far as its purely municipal relations are concerned, simply an agency of the state for conducting the affairs of government, and, as such, it is subject to the control of the legislature." It may be observed here that the decisions by the supreme court of Kansas are in substantial accord with these principles. That court, in the present case, approved what was said in Clinton v. Cedar Rapids & M. River R. Co. 24 Iowa, 455, 475, in which the supreme court of Iowa said: "Municipal corporations owe their origin to, and derive their powers and rights wholly from, the legislature. It breathes into them the breath of life, without which they cannot exist. As it creates, so it may destroy. If it may destroy, it may abridge and control. Unless there is some constitutional limitation on the right, the legislature might, by a single act, if we can suppose it capable of so great a folly and so great a wrong, sweep from existence all of the municipal corporations in the state, and the corporation could not prevent it. We know of no limitation on this right so far as the corporations themselves are concerned. They are, so to phrase it, the mere tenants at will of the legislature." See also Re Dalton, 61 Kan. 257, 47 L. R. A. 380, 59 Pac. 336; State ex rel. Barton County Attorney v. Lake Keon Nav. Reservoir & Irrig. Co. 63 Kan. 394, 65 Pac. 681; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Shawnee County, 28 Kan. 431, 433; Frederick v. Groshon, 30 Md. 436, 444, 96 Am. Dec. 591.

The improvement of the boulevard in question was a work *of which the state, if [222] it had deemed it proper to do so, could have taken immediate charge by its own agents; for it is one of the functions of government to provide public highways for the convenience and comfort of the people. Instead of undertaking that work directly, the state invested one of its governmental agencies with power to care for it. Whether done by the state directly or by one of its instrumentalities, the work was of a public, not private character.

If then, the work upon which the defendant employed Reese was of a public character, it necessarily follows that the statute in question, in its application to those undertaking work for or on behalf of a municipal corporation of the state, does not infringe the personal liberty of anyone. It may be that the state, in enacting the statute, intended to give its sanction to the view held by many, that, all things considered, the general welfare of employees, mechanics, and workmen, upon whom rest a portion of the burdens of government, will be subserved if labor performed for eight continuous hours was taken to be a full day's work; that the restriction of a day's work to that number of hours would promote morality, improve the physical and intellectual condition of laborers and workmen, and enable them the better to discharge the duties appertaining to citizenship. We have no occasion here to consider these questions, or to determine upon which side is the sounder reason; for whatever may have been the motives controlling the enactment of the statute in question, we can imagine no possible ground to dispute the power of the state to declare that no one undertaking work for it or for one of its municipal agencies should permit or require an employee on such work to labor in excess of eight hours each day, and to inflict punishment upon those who are embraced by such regulations and yet disregard them. It cannot be deemed a part of the liberty of any contractor that he be allowed to do public work in any mode he may choose to adopt, without regard to the wishes of the state. On the contrary, it belongs to the state, as the guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its [223] affairs, to prescribe *the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities. No court has authority to review its action in that respect. Regulations on this subject suggest only considerations of public policy. And with such considerations the courts have no concern.

If it be contended to be the right of every one to dispose of his labor upon such terms as he deems best,—as undoubtedly it is,—and that to make it a criminal offense for a contractor for public work to permit or require his employee to perform labor upon that work in excess of eight hours each day is in derogation of the liberty both of employees and employer, it is sufficient to answer that no employee is entitled, of absolute right and as a part of his liberty, to perform labor for the state; and no contractor for public work can excuse a violation of his agreement with the state by doing that which the statute under which he proceeds distinctly and lawfully forbids him to do.

So, also, if it be said that a statute like the one before us is mischievous in its tendencies, the answer is that the responsibility therefor rests upon legislators, not upon the courts. No evils arising from such legislation could be more far-reaching than those that might come to our system of government if the judiciary, abandoning the sphere assigned to it by the fundamental law, should enter the domain of legislation, and, upon grounds merely of justice or reason or wisdom, annul statutes that had received the sanction of the people's representatives. We are reminded by counsel that it is the solemn duty of the courts in cases before them to guard the constitutional rights of the citizen against merely arbitrary power. That is unquestionably true. But it is equally true—indeed, the public interests imperatively demand—that legislative enactments should be recognized and enforced by the courts as embodying the will of the people, unless they are plainly and palpably, beyond all question, in violation of the fundamental law of the Constitution. It cannot be affirmed of *the statute of Kansas [224] that it is plainly inconsistent with that instrument; indeed, its constitutionality is beyond all question.

Equally without any foundation upon which to rest is the proposition that the Kansas statute denied to the defendant or to his employee the equal protection of the laws. The rule of conduct prescribed by it applies alike to all who contract to do work on behalf either of the state or of its municipal subdivisions, and alike to all employed to perform labor on such work.

Some stress is laid on the fact stipulated by the parties for the purposes of this case, that the work performed by defendant's employee is not dangerous to life, limb, or health, and that daily labor on it for ten hours would not be injurious to him in any way. In the view we take of this case, such considerations are not controlling. We rest our decision upon the broad ground that the work being of a public character, absolutely under the control of the state and its municipal agents acting by its authority, it is for the state to prescribe the conditions under which it will permit work of that kind to be done. Its action touching such a matter is final so long as it does not, by its regulations, infringe the personal rights of others; and that has not been done.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas is affirmed.

STUART R. KNOTT et al.

Direct appeal from circuit court — case in which jurisdiction is in issue.

The question whether a Federal circuit court, under the principles of equity and comity governing all courts having concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject-matter, has authority to administer a trust estate after a suit with reference thereto has been begun in a state court, does not involve the jurisdiction of the circuit court as a Federal tribunal, which alone, under the act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, § 5 (26 Stat. at L. 826, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549), can furnish ground for a direct appeal to the Federal Supreme Court as a case in which "the jurisdiction of the court is in issue."

Submitted October 13, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky to review a denial of a motion to direct its receiver to surrender possession to a receiver appointed by a state court. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

See same case below, 124 Fed. 342.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John L. Dodd, David W. Baird, and Aaron Kohn submitted the cause for appellant. Messrs. J. C. Dodd and T. W. Spindle were with them on the brief.

Messrs. Alexander P. Humphrey and James P. Helm submitted the cause for appellants.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This case arises out of the conflicting claims by the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky, and the circuit court of Jefferson county, Kentucky, chancery branch, as to the right to administer the property and affairs of the Evening Post Company, a corporation of Kentucky.

The Federal court having possession, by its receiver, of the property of that company, declined to surrender possession to the Louisville Trust Company, the receiver appointed by the state court. From the final order dismissing the intervening petition of the latter company, the present appeal was prosecuted. That order stated: "This appeal is granted solely upon the question of jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the trust estate of the Evening Post Company in controversy, and the question of whether this court, or the said Jefferson *circuit[226] court, chancery branch, first division, has prior jurisdiction in [is] the single question upon which this cause is decided as to the said Louisville Trust Company; this court holding that its jurisdiction over the said trust estate of the Evening Post Company is prior and exclusive of the said Jefferson circuit court, chancery branch, first division, all of which is hereby certified on the appeal of the said Louisville Trust Company as receiver, etc., to the Supreme Court of the United States for review as required by law."

It will be more satisfactory and conducive to a clear understanding of the precise ground upon which our decision must rest if the principal facts in the history of this controversy be stated.

On the 30th day of April, 1903, at a meeting of the stockholders of the Post Company, a resolution was adopted—all the stockholders except the owners of 48 shares concurring—by which the Columbia Finance & Trust Company was appointed liquidator of that corporation, with authority to conduct its business and affairs for the benefit of stockholders until its property could be sold and possession delivered to the purchaser in accordance with the statute of Kentucky. The liquidator was directed from the proceeds of sale to pay the debts of the corporation, and to distribute any balance remaining among stockholders according to their legal rights. It took immediate possession of all the property, books, and papers of the Post Company.

On the 10th day of May, 1903, another corporation was organized under the laws of Kentucky. It is referred to in the record as the New Evening Post Company. To that company the liquidator on May 18th, 1903, leased the property and assets of the old company, until a sale should take place.

Prior to the making of that instrument, to wit, on May 12th, 1903, the executors and executrix of the estate of W. N. Haldeman commenced a suit in the Jefferson (Kentucky) circuit court, chancery branch, first [227] division, against the old Post *Company, the Columbia Finance & Trust Company, Richard W. Knott, J. M. Atherton, John R. Knott, Eugene Q. Knott, and Laura G. Boyle; the plaintiffs and the individual defendants being respectively owners of stock in the old company. The object of that suit, as disclosed by the petition, was to obtain a settlement of the accounts of the company and of its liquidator; and to that end the plaintiffs asked a reference of the cause to the commissioner of the court to audit and settle the accounts of the Columbia Finance & Trust Company, and after such auditing and settlement, that the assets of the company be sold, and the proceeds distributed according to law. The plaintiffs further prayed that pending the action, and until the final liquidation of the affairs of the old company, and the sale of its assets, the court determine whether its affairs should be continued in operation, and if so, that the management of the plant be under the direction of the court; further, that a preliminary order be entered, commanding and directing the defendants and each of them to allow the plaintiffs reasonable access to, and an examination of, the books, papers, documents, and affairs of the old company, including all documentary information in connection therewith in the possession of defendants or of either of them.

On the 19th of May, 1903, upon due notice, the plaintiffs moved for an order directing the defendants to allow the plaintiffs, their counsel, and accountant, reasonable access to, and inspection of, the books, records, and documents of the old company, relating to its assets, liabilities, and business affairs. To that motion the defendants objected, and the motion was assigned for hearing on May 23d, 1903. On the day last named the parties appeared, the plaintiffs filed affidavits in support of their motion, and the defendants interposed a demurrer to the petition, as well as filed their several answers. The motion and demurrer were heard in part, and the further hearing of them was postponed until May 25th, 1903. On the latter day, the hearing not being concluded, the cause was postponed until the 30th of May, on [228] which day it was submitted *on the pending motion of plaintiffs, on defendants' demurrer to the petition, and on a motion of the Columbia Finance & Trust Company, entered on that day, for leave to file an amended and supplemental answer. By an order entered June 4th, 1903, the plaintiffs' motion, made on the 19th day of May, 1903, was sustained, and the defendants, and each of them, were commanded and directed, until the further orders of the court, to allow and afford the plaintiffs, their attorneys, or accountant, during business hours, reasonable access to, and an inspection of, the books, records, and documents of the Post Company, touching its conditions and business affairs, and especially touching its assets and liabilities, and the considerations paid or received therefor. The demurrer of the defendants was also overruled, and the objection to the filing of the amended and supplemental answer of the Columbia Finance & Trust Company, trustee, tendered May 30th, 1903, was sustained.

While the above motion in the state court was pending, Stuart R. Knott, a citizen of Missouri, and not a party to the suit in the state court, obtained, May 26th, 1903, in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky, a judgment against the old company for $6,000 with interest from April 30th, 1903. Upon that judgment execution immediately issued and was returned the next day, May 27th, 1903, "no property found." And on the latter day the present suit was commenced by him in the United States circuit court, against the Evening Post Company, Columbia Finance & Trust Company, R. W. Knott, B. G. Boyle, and E. Q. Knott, each defendant being a citizen of Kentucky. The prayer of the bill was that the court at once appoint a receiver of all the rights, properties, franchises, books of account, records, documents, choses in action, and all other things belonging to the Post Company, forthwith to report what such property is, and what arrangement can be made for the continued publication of said paper until a decree could be entered directing a sale herein; that all proper *equitable relief may be had looking to the [229] administration of the estate of the company and the payment of its just debts; and to that end the sale of its property and the bringing of any money produced by such sale into the registry of the court for distribution among creditors.

On the 23th day of May, 1903, all the defendants in the suit in the United States circuit court assenting thereto, a receiver of the property and assets of the Post Company was appointed by that court, and the defendants were directed forthwith to deliver to him all such property and assets of every kind and description. That receiver took immediate possession and, under the authority of the court, entered into a contract with the new company for the publication of the paper until the assets of the old company were sold.

The plaintiff in the suit in the state court entered, June 13th, 1903, a formal motion to appoint a receiver to take charge of and manage the property and affairs of the Post Company; and on June 18th the defendants in that suit appeared and objected to the motion upon the ground that the assets of the company were already in the possession and under the control of a receiver appointed by the United States circuit court in the suit instituted by Stuart R. Knott. This objection was overruled, and the state court, by order entered June 27th, 1903, appointed the Louisville Trust Company receiver, with authority to claim and take possession of the property and assets of the Post Company. By the same order the commissioner of the court was directed to audit, state, and settle the accounts of the Columbia Finance & Trust Company as liquidator and trustee of the old Post Company.

[230] Subsequently, June 30th, 1903, the state court, by order then entered, directed its receiver to intervene in the suit instituted in the Federal court, and claim the estate in question for administration and settlement in the state court. The latter court was of the opinion that its jurisdiction to administer the said trust estate first attached, and in order that the relief sought at its hands might be granted it was necessary *that it have possession and control of the property of the Post Company. Its receiver was therefore ordered to intervene in the suit pending in the Federal court, claim the trust estate for administration and settlement in the state court, and test the question as to the prior jurisdiction of the state court over the subject-matter.

Pursuant to that order the Louisville Trust Company intervened in the suit in the Federal court, and moved that its receiver be directed to turn over the property to the receiver of the state court. This motion was denied, Judge Evans, of the Federal court, accompanying the denial of the motion with an elaborate opinion (Knott v. Evening Post Co. 124 Fed. 242), which concluded as follows: "First, that the proceedings in the suit in the state court, when given their just effect, had not, in any way, when this court's receiver was appointed, brought into the custody of that court any property of the Evening Post Company, nor could they be regarded as having, in fact, done so even if their scope were measured by the prayer of the plaintiff's petition rather than its averments; second, that it was, therefore, open to this court to appoint a receiver, and thereby judicially seize the property of the company at the instance of a judgment creditor; and, third, that having thus first acquired jurisdiction over the property thus seized, the established principles of law and the plain rights of the judgment creditor demand that this court shall maintain its jurisdiction over it under these circumstances as certainly as it would have abandoned it if the first seizure had been by the state court. It results that the motion of the intervening petitioner must be overruled and denied and intervening petition dismissed."

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court dismissing the intervening petition of the Louisville Trust Company is not subject to review here upon direct appeal or writ of error to that court.

*By the judiciary act of March 3d, 1891,[232] chap. 517, 26 Stat. at L. 826 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549), an appeal or a writ of error, as the one of the other mode may be proper, can be taken directly from a circuit court to this court in certain specified cases, among which is "any case in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue;" and "in such cases the question of jurisdiction alone shall be certified to the Supreme Court from the court below for decision." § 5. In all cases, other than those specified in § 5 of that act, the circuit court of appeals is given appellate jurisdiction. § 6.

The question presented by the certificate of the circuit court is not one of jurisdiction, within the meaning of the 5th section of the act of 1891, and the jurisdiction of that court was not "in issue." There was diversity in the citizenship of the parties to this suit, instituted by Stuart R. Knott as a citizen of Missouri, and no question was raised, or could have been raised, as to the authority of the circuit court, as a Federal court, to take cognizance of it. The issue made by the intervening petition of the Louisville Trust Company did not involve the jurisdiction of that court, as a Federal tribunal, to appoint a receiver of the assets and property of the Evening Post Company. What the circuit court did in that respect was questioned by the Trust Company, on behalf of the state court, solely upon the ground that the taking by the Federal court of possession of the property and assets of the Post Company—after the state court, by the institution of the Haldeman suit, had acquired authority to appoint a receiver of such property and assets for administration—was in violation of the rule recognized in courts of equity, whether of Federal or state origin, that "where the jurisdiction of a court, and the right of a plaintiff to prosecute his suit in it, have once attached, that right cannot be arrested or taken away by proceedings in another court;" that as the object of the suit in the state court could not be accomplished without possession of the property and assets of the Post Company, the seizure of such property and assets under the order of the Federal court, whereby the state court was prevented from giving any *effectual relief to the parties before it,[233] was inconsistent with the relations which, upon principles of comity and right, always exist between courts having concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject-matter.

Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 624, 12 L. ed. 846; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 596, 15 L. ed. 1032.

In all this there was nothing involving the jurisdiction of the circuit court as a Federal tribunal, whose jurisdiction is regulated by acts of Congress. The question of jurisdiction which the statute permits to be certified to this court directly must be one involving the jurisdiction of the circuit court as a Federal court, and not simply its general authority as a judicial tribunal to proceed in harmony with established rules of practice governing courts of concurrent jurisdiction as between each other.

We think this question was substantially so determined in Smith v. McKay, 161 U. S. 355, 357, 40 L. ed. 731, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490. That was a suit in equity for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using certain patented machines until they had fully paid the fees they had agreed to pay to the patentee. The defendants moved to dismiss the bill upon the ground that there was a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law,—thus raising only a question of equity jurisdiction. The motion to dismiss was denied. After final decree for the plaintiff, the case was brought directly to this court by appeal, and it was assigned for error that the circuit court erred in not dismissing the suit for want of jurisdiction. The position of the appellee in that case was that only questions of Federal jurisdiction could be brought directly here; and that if the circuit court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the matters in dispute, the fact that the remedy of the plaintiff was at law, rather than in equity, raised no question of jurisdiction within the meaning of the 5th section of the judiciary act of March 3d, 1891, under which the appeal was taken.

The court observed that the question had never been directly decided by it, but that it arose in the World's Columbian Exposition Case, 6 C. C. A. 58, 18 U. S. App. 42, 56 Fed. [234] 654, in which the circuit court, *sitting in equity, granted an injunction to prevent the opening of the Exposition Grounds to the public on Sunday. That case was taken by appeal to the circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit, and a motion was there made to dismiss the appeal. Chief Justice Fuller, speaking for that court, said: The "appellees have submitted a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the circuit court was in issue; that the case involved the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States; that the constitutionality of laws of the United States was drawn in question therein; that therefore the appeal from a final decree would lie to the Supreme Court of the United States, and not to this court; and hence that this appeal, which is from an interlocutory order, cannot be maintained under the 7th section of the judiciary act of March 3d, 1891. We do not understand that the power of the circuit court to hear and determine the cause was denied, but that the appellants contended that the United States had not, by their bill, made a case properly cognizable in a court of equity. The objection was the want of equity, and not the want of power. The jurisdiction of the circuit court was, therefore, not in issue within the intent and meaning of the act."

Referring to these observations of the Chief Justice, this court in Smith v. McKay said: "We regard this as a sound exposition of the law, and, applied to the case now in hand, it demands a dismissal of the appeal, on the ground that the objection was not to the want of power in the circuit court to entertain the suit, but to the want of equity in the complainant's bill. The applicants' contention in this respect would require us to entertain an appeal from the circuit court in every case in equity in which the defendant should choose to file a demurrer to the bill on the ground that there was a remedy at law. When the requisite citizenship of the parties appears, and the subject-matter is such that the circuit court is competent to deal with it, the jurisdiction of that court attaches, and whether the court should sustain the complainant's *prayer for [235] equitable relief, or should dismiss the bill with leave to bring an action at law, either would be a valid exercise of jurisdiction. If any error were committed in the exercise of such jurisdiction, it could only be remedied by an appeal to the circuit court of appeals." 161 U. S. 355, 358, 40 L. ed. 731, 732, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490, 492.

In principle, the judgment in Smith v. McKay embraces the present case. The issue presented by the intervening petition did not raise any question under the Constitution or statutes of the United States, and depended only upon principles of general law applicable to all courts having concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject-matter. We repeat that the jurisdiction of the circuit court was not and is not questioned for want of power in that court, as a Federal tribunal, to take possession of the assets and property of the Post Company; only its authority, upon principles of equity and comity, to do that of which complaint was made by the Louisville Trust Company. We do not think that Congress intended that any such question should be the basis of a direct appeal to this court from a circuit court.

The question again arose in Blythe v. Hinckley, 173 U. S. 501, 506, 43 L. ed. 783, 785, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 497, where this court said: "Appeals or writs of error may be taken directly from the circuit court to this court in cases in which the jurisdiction of those courts is in issue, that is, their jurisdiction as Federal courts, the question alone of jurisdiction being certified to this court. The circuit court held that the remedy was at law, and not in equity. That conclusion was not a decision that the circuit court had no jurisdiction as a court of the United States. Smith v. McKay, 161 U. S. 355, 40 L. ed. 731, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490; Blythe Co. v. Blythe, 172 U. S. 644, 43 L. ed. 1183, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 873. The circuit court dismissed the bills on another ground; namely, that the judgments of the state courts could not be reviewed by that court on the reasons put forward. This, also, was not in itself a decision of want of jurisdiction because the circuit court was a Federal court, but a decision that the circuit court was unable to grant relief because of the judgments rendered by those other courts. If we were to [236]take jurisdiction *on this certificate, we could only determine whether the circuit court had jurisdiction as a court of the United States, and as the decree rested on no denial of its jurisdiction as such, but was rendered in the exercise of that jurisdiction, it is obvious that this appeal cannot be maintained in that aspect."

It is proper to observe that this court in Shields v. Coleman, 157 U. S. 168, 177, 39 L. ed. 660, 663, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570, assumed jurisdiction upon direct appeal from a circuit court in a case involving the question whether that court had authority to appoint a receiver of property which was at the time in the possession of a receiver appointed by a state court. As the Federal court had, in that case, taken property out of the physical possession of a receiver of the state court, this court expressed its views upon the question whether the possession of the state court should have been disturbed by the Federal court, and it rendered judgment accordingly. But the precise question here presented as to the jurisdiction of this court under the act of 1891, on direct appeal from the circuit court, was not there raised or considered. In United States v. More (1805) 3 Cranch, 159, 171, 2 L. ed. 397, 401, it was held that 'this court was without jurisdiction, under the law as it then was, to review the final judgment of the circuit court of the District of Columbia in a criminal case. It was suggested at the bar, in that case, that this court had, in a previous case, exercised appellate jurisdiction in a criminal case. Chief Justice Marshall met that suggestion by saying: "No question was made in that case as to the jurisdiction. It passed sub silentio, and the court does not consider itself as bound by that case." To the same effect, 'substantially, are United States v. Sanges, 144 U. S. 310, 319, 36 L. ed. 445, 449, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, and Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 83, 36 L. ed. 896, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22.

In the circumstances of the present case, and to avoid misapprehension in the future, we deem it our duty distinctly to declare the true meaning of the word jurisdiction as used in the 5th section of the judiciary act of 1891.

For the reasons stated, the appeal from the Circuit Court must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court.

It is so ordered.

Argued November 9, 10, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of the Sixteenth Judicial District of that State in favor of the plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

NOTE.—As to land grants to railroads—see note to Kansas P. R. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 L. ed. U. S. 794.

See same case below, 85 Minn. 481, 89 N. W. 866.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

This was an action in ejectment commenced on February 15, 1900, by John P. O'Connor against Jacob Gertgens, in the district court of the sixteenth judicial district of the state of Minnesota, to recover possession of the southwest section 9, township 125, range 45 west. The defendant appeared and answered. A trial was had before the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff, which was, on April 4, 1902, affirmed by the supreme court of the state (85 Minn. 481, 89 N. W. 866), and thereupon this writ of error was sued out.

[238] *The facts are these: The tract was surveyed public land, situate in the county of Traverse, and lying within the twenty-mile indemnity limits of the grant to the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company, as defined by acts of Congress dated respectively March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. at L. 195, chap. 99), and March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. at L. 526, chap. 105). It, with other lands, was withdrawn from settlement and entry under the land laws of the United States by executive withdrawal, dated May 25, 1869. In April, 1885, the tract, being within the indemnity limits, was, with other tracts, selected by the railway company as indemnity for deficiencies claimed to exist within the place limits. These selections were all finally canceled on October 23, 1896.

Prior to April 15, 1891, the land was unoccupied, but at that time the defendant, being fully qualified as a homestead claimant, took possession with a view of claiming it as a homestead under the laws of the United States, has ever since occupied it as his homestead, and made improvements thereon of the value of $1,200. He made application at the local land office for a homestead entry but it was refused by the local land officials, and such refusal sustained on appeal by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The refusal was on the ground that the land was within the 20-mile indemnity limits of the railway company, and had been selected by the company in 1885, long before the defendant went upon the land.

In July, 1880, the railway company entered into a written agreement with the Rev. John Ireland, a citizen of the United States, by which the company gave him the sole and exclusive right and authority to place settlers upon and sell to them all the lands in the counties of Big Stone and Traverse, to which the railway company might be entitled by virtue of the land grants of March 3, 1857, and March 3, 1865, and which were included within the indemnity limits of said grants.

This contract expired December 31, 1881. On March 30, 1883, the railway company made a new agreement, which, after referring to the prior contract, contained this stipulation:

*"Now, therefore, the contract herein referred to having expired on the 31st day of [239] of December, A. D. 1881, and the R. R. Co. not yet having acquired title to the lands in question, it is now agreed between the R. R. Co. and the Rev. John Ireland that when title to these lands are acquired by the R. R. Co., and notice of the same is given to Rev. John Ireland, he shall have the privilege and the right at any time within sixty days of date of said notice of purchasing for himself or such parties as he may designate, due regard being had, as stated in supplement to said contract, for settlers who may have obtained any claim upon such lands previous to the date of said contract, any or all of the lands included in said contract, not to exceed the amount of 50,000 acres at uniform price of $4 per acre, 10 per centum of all receipts from said lands at the above price to be furthermore paid to the said Rev. John Ireland, according as the monies are received by the company, when such lands shall be purchased by Rev. John Ireland or those whom he may designate, the conditions of sale usual with the company shall be observed, or, at least, the interest upon the purchase money shall be paid from the date of purchase to the 15th day of December following, when the usual condition shall be enforced."

This agreement was duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Traverse county, Minnesota. On February 8, 1896, Ireland made application to the Land Department for leave to purchase from the government the land in controversy under the provisions of the 5th section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 556, chap. 376, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1595). This application was contested by the defendant, but the claim of Ireland was sustained by all the officials of the Land Department, from the local officers up to the Secretary of the Interior. A patent was thereupon issued to Ireland, from whom the plaintiff obtained a conveyance. The act of March 3, 1887, was an act directing the Secretary of the Interior to adjust, in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court, *the several railroad land grants made [240] by Congress. Section 5, under which Ireland made his claim is copied in the margin.†

†Sec. 5. Where neither party could force the other to perfect a sale, there could certainly be no grounds for claiming a sale had been made, absolute or conditional, legal or equitable.

Bishop, Contr. § 78, and cases cited.

Again, before the option in the case at bar could become a contract binding on either party, it would have been necessary for Ireland to have complied with its terms by not only selecting the specific lands he would take out of the 50,000 acres, and notifying the company thereof, but also by paying or tendering the amount stated in the option, to wit, $4 per acre.

and whose claims and occupation have not since been voluntarily abandoned, as to which excepted lands the said pre-emption and homestead claimants shall be permitted to perfect their proofs and entries, and receive patents therefor: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to lands settled upon subsequent to the first day of December, eighteen hundred and eighty-two, by persons claiming to enter the same under the settlement laws of the United States, as to which lands the parties claiming the same as aforesaid shall be entitled to prove up and enter as in other like cases.

Purchase, in its broad and liberal sense, includes every mode of acquisition save that of descent, and in the most narrow sense in which it was ever employed it means acquisition by the payment of a sum of money. But neither of these is the popular sense. Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The patent was issued to Ireland after a contest between him and the defendant, in which the several officials of the Land Department, from the local officers to the Secretary of the Interior, sustained his contention. The decisions of the Land Department in such contest cases are conclusive upon all questions of fact. Burfenning v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 163 U. S. 321, 323, 41 L. ed. 175, 176, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1018, and cases cited; Johnson v. Drew, 171 U. S. 93, 99, 43 L. ed. 88, 90, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 800; Gardner v. Bonestell, 180 U. S. 362, 45 L. ed. 191 U. S.

574, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 399; De Cambra v. Rogers, 189 U. S. 119, 47 L. ed. 734, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 519. The patent passed the legal title to Ireland. *It devolved upon the defendant, contesting that title, to show a superior right, legal or equitable, to the land. Both the trial and supreme courts of the state decided against the defendant's claim. We have thus the unanimous conclusions of all the officers of the Land Department of the United States and of the judges of the courts of the state, to whom the question could be presented, in favor of plaintiff's title.

In respect to certain requirements of § 5, under which the Land Department acted, there is no question. Ireland was a citizen of the United States. The tract was within the contract made by the company with him in 1883. It had never been conveyed to the company, or for its use. It was an odd-numbered section, within the limits of the grant, and coterminous with a constructed part of the road. It was excepted from the operation of the grant because of a defect in the selection of indemnity lands. All these matters being beyond dispute, there remain open the questions whether the land could be deemed to have been sold by the company to Ireland, and whether he was a bona fide purchaser; and further, conceding that Ireland comes within the provisions of the section, whether the equitable rights of the defendant as a homestead settler are superior.

Was there a sale, and was Ireland a bona fide purchaser within the scope of said section? It is contended on the one hand that these are questions of fact concluded by the decisions of the Land Department, and on the other that it is the duty of the court to construe a written instrument, and as the agreement between the company and Ireland was in writing, it is a question of law and not of fact whether there was a sale by the company, and a purchase by Ireland. Doubtless, whether a transaction evidenced by a written agreement was a real transaction or a sham, whether it was executed with a fraudulent intent or in good faith, may present questions of fact, and in so far as those questions are involved in this case the conclusions of the Land Department are final. We must accept the agreement between the company and Ireland as *genuine, made in good faith, and supported, so far as it can be, by all outside facts, such as a sufficient consideration.

It is, however, earnestly contended that there was no sale or purchase; that the company gave only a mere option, which, though binding on it, cast no obligations on Ireland. If he wanted to complete the contract and pay for the land, he might do so. If he did not, he was under no liability to the company. Strictly speaking, this contention is correct. Ireland had made no payment for this land, had made no absolute promise to pay, and it was optional with him whether he took the land or not. And if it be a condition of acquiring a right under this section, that the party claiming must either have paid or promised to pay, then Ireland was not entitled to any benefit therefrom. But we think the section does not compel such construction. We have more than once held that the entire statute was remedial in its nature, and must be construed so as to carry out the intent of Congress, and secure to the parties the intended relief. Primarily, the purpose was to secure an adjustment of the various land grants in aid of railroads. Much confusion had existed in the construction and administration of those grants. There had been conflicting decisions, and Congress attempted, without displacing vested rights, to do equity to all parties claiming interests in lands within these various grants. It did not purpose to merely define legal rights or prescribe new methods for their enforcement. The courts were competent under the law, as it stood, without additional legislation to preserve such rights.

There were three parties whose interests and equities were to be regarded: First, the railway company, the beneficiary of the grant; second, parties who had dealt with the railway company in reference to lands claimed by it to be within the scope of its grant; and, third, parties who had attempted to secure title under the settlement laws of the United States. With reference to the railway company, it is sufficient to say that Congress aimed to limit its acquisition of [243] title to the *amount of land which it had in fact earned by the construction of the road, and prescribed that the adjustment with it should be made in accordance with the rulings of this court; authorized actions to recover any lands improperly conveyed to the company, or if the company had parted with them, the value thereof in money.

As to those who had dealt with the railway company, its evident purpose was to secure to them the lands they had contracted for, in so far as it could be done without trespassing on the rights of settlers. The scope of § 5 is disclosed by its opening words, "where any said company shall have sold." In case of a sale, certain privileges are given upon certain conditions. Nowhere does it provide as one of those conditions that the company shall have received full, or indeed any, payment. If there is a sale it is sufficient. Why, in a remedial statute, may not the word include a sale upon conditions,—one in which the proposed buyer has an election to accept the company's promise?

The section does not attempt to relieve any one whose transactions with the railway company were not in good faith. The term "bona fide purchaser" is used in the statute; but as we pointed out in United States v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 165 U. S. 463, 480, 481, 41 L. ed. 789, 797, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 368, not in any technical sense, but simply as demanding good faith in the transactions between the individual and the company. It is true that the parties who, in that case, had dealt with the company had in fact purchased and paid value, and it was unnecessary to consider anything more than the effect of such transactions. But still it was distinctly held that the term "bona fide purchaser" was not intended in any technical sense, but only as one implying good faith.

In reference to Ireland's actions under his contracts with the company, the supreme court of the state said (p. 488, N. W. p. 868):

"Under his first contract with the railroad company, Ireland expended large sums of money, and devoted a great deal of time to a colonization enterprise, and the expenditure and labor were kept up until 1883, large numbers of people being *thereby induced to [244] settle in a new country tributary to the line of road belonging to the company.

"By it the company constituted Ireland its mere agent to make sales of the lands therein scheduled, to receive payments thereon, and to bind it to convey when its title should be perfected, or to return the money paid, in case it failed to obtain title.

"The agreement of March 30 was wholly different. The agency was at an end. Ireland was given the right to purchase for himself and for others 50,000 acres at a stipulated price per acre, and upon certain terms. The company could not then convey; when it could was uncertain, and it was agreed that purchasers should not be obliged to pay any part of the purchase price until it was within the power of the company to give good title. This was the construction placed upon the contract by the parties thereto, and it was the rational and proper one. Ireland proceeded under this contract, as he had under the first, to secure purchasers for these lands. They became actual residents and received contracts for conveyances. He expended much time and large sums of money in the scheme to populate the country in question, and his success was very noticeable."

It is not pretended that what he did under these contracts, including therein his outlays of time and money, were, under his last agreement, to be accepted by the company as so much payment for the land, but these facts are stated to show the bona fides of the transaction; that it was not an attempt by means of a mere option to facilitate the acquisition of title from the government to the injury of bona fide settlers. On the contrary, Ireland was seeking to bring settlers on these lands, and thus aiding in carrying out the general purpose of the government to transform the vacant public lands into homes. Surely a purpose so in harmony with that of the government and an effort in the way that he pursued to carry that purpose into effect makes a case appealing to the favorable consideration of Congress, [245] and is in its nature essentially *different from a pure speculation in public lands at the expense of bona fide settlers. The rulings of the Land Department have been along the line of a recognition of the fact that attempts in good faith by a party to obtain from a railroad company for bona fide settlements lands believed to belong to it or expected to be acquired by it, present cases which were intended to be included within the act of 1887, and entitled to its protection. Re Campbell, 12 Land Dec. 247; Telford v. Keystone Lumber Co. 18 Land Dec. 176, 19 Land Dec. 141; Holton v. Rutledge, 20 Land Dec. 227; Austin v. Luey, 21 Land Dec. 507.

It must be borne in mind that the purpose of § 5 was not relief to the company, but to one dealing with it. Ireland by his contract had obtained rights from the company, even if he had not assumed obligations to it. The land was the property of the government, and property to which the company acquired no title, but being within the limits of its grant it had claimed a right, and contracted with Ireland as though it had or would receive the title. Section 5 gave to Ireland only a right to purchase this land from the government,—a preferential right,—paying to the government its price, no portion of which was to pass to the railway company, and gave him that preferential right because of his dealings with the company. He had sought to obtain title to this land from the company. He had made a contract by which, if the company acquired title, he could obtain that title; and Congress, by § 5, simply provided that, having so acted in respect to this land, he should have a preferential right of purchase. The company neither gains nor loses. The government receives its price for the land, and is, therefore, fully protected, and Ireland receives that in respect to which he certainly has some equitable claim of consideration,—a preferential right of purchase.

The third party is the settler under the land laws, and we pass to consider his status and rights. A settler is, as has often been said, favored in law, but it does not follow therefrom that he is the only one whose

§ 5, made provision for his protection,—such provision as it deemed sufficient. While it gave to purchasers from the railway company a preferential right of purchase, it excepted therefrom lands which at the times of such purchase “were in the bona fide occupation of adverse claimants under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, and whose claims and occupation have not since been voluntarily abandoned.” In other words, it said that no purchaser from the railway company should have a preferential right of purchasing any lands which at the time of his dealings with the railway company were in the hands of a bona fide settler under the laws of the United States, unless such settler should voluntarily abandon his settlement. As between a purchaser from the railway company and a settler on the lands, the settler was given the prior right. But the defendant was not a settler at the time of Ireland’s contract, nor, indeed, until many years thereafter. Neither did he come under the protection of the second proviso, for, although his settlement was after December 1, 1882, it was not until long after the passage of the act.

It is well to look further into his equities. It will be borne in mind that he did not go upon the land until April, 1891. The tract was within the indemnity limits of the company’s grant, and was, therefore, subject to selection. It had been withdrawn from entry under the land laws, and that fact appeared on the records of the local land office. It had, in fact, been selected by the company, and that selection had not been canceled. Ireland’s contract of 1883 was of record in the office of the register of deeds of the county, and shown on the books of the company. The defendant applied for leave to enter the lands as a homestead, and was denied such leave by the local land officers on the ground that it was within the twenty-mile indemnity limits of the railway company’s grant, and had been selected by the company. He was charged with knowledge of the act of Congress giving a preferential right of purchase from the government in case the company’s title *should in any way [247] fail. Notwithstanding all this, he remained upon the land, and put his improvements on it, and now claims to be entitled to the rights of a bona fide settler. He does not come within the letter of the statute, nor does he come within the reach of any reasonable equities. He evidently took his chances on the possibility of the company’s failing to obtain title and a subsequent failure of Ireland to insist upon his preferential right of purchase. He went upon the land with full knowledge of all the facts,—which showed that he had no right to enter, —speculating upon possibilities which have not been realized, and having so speculated, he cannot complain if he suffer the consequences which often attend the failure of a speculation.

We think the judgment of the Supreme Court of Minnesota was right, and it is affirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Highways—defects—knowledge — contributory negligence.

One who, with knowledge of the situation, elects, in descending the steps from her residence to the sidewalk, to cross over a projecting uncovered water box about 4 inches square, with its outer edge about 4 inches from a line drawn from the tread of the step nearest the sidewalk to the ground, instead of avoiding the box by stepping to one side, is not, as a matter of law, guilty of such contributory negligence as will defeat her action against the municipality to recover damages for the personal injuries sustained by reason of her failure to clear the box.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error—husband and wife—sued to recover the amount of the damage alleged to have been sustained from a personal injury suffered by the wife as the result of a fall on a sidewalk in the District of Columbia. We shall hereafter refer to the wife as the plaintiff. The fall was al-[252]leged *to have been caused by a hole resulting from an uncovered water box in the sidewalk, which appliance for a long time had been allowed to be in a dangerous condition through the neglect of the defendant. At the close of the evidence the court instructed a verdict for the defendant on the ground of the contributory neglect of the plaintiff; and, on appeal, the action of the court in so doing was affirmed. 17 App. D. C. 401.

It is not contended at bar, if it be found that error was committed in taking the case from the jury because of the contributory neglect of the plaintiff, nevertheless, the judgment should be affirmed because there was no adequate proof to go to the jury on the question of the negligence of the defendant. The sole controversy, hence, is whether the case was rightly taken from the jury because as a matter of law, contributory neglect on the part of the plaintiff was demonstrated.

Two elements of fact are involved in determining whether the alleged contributory neglect of the plaintiff was a question for the jury or for the court. The first is, what were the undisputed facts? and the second, whether such facts necessarily engender the ultimate inference of fact as to contributory neglect. The elementary law is that issues of fact are to be decided by the jury. But where the probative facts are undisputed, and where all reasonable minds can draw but one inference from them, the question to be determined is one of law for the court. Marande v. Texas & P. R. Co. 184 U. S. 173,

In other words, the principle is that where there is no disputed issue of fact, and in reason no controversy as to the inferences to be drawn from the undisputed facts, there can be no real question of fact to be passed on by the jury. Were the facts bearing on the question of contributory negligence undisputed, and, if so, could reasonable minds deduce only one inference from them? The court below recited what it deemed to be the undisputed facts concerning the water box and the event which took place at the time of the fall of the plaintiff on the sidewalk, as follows:

*"The water box was in the sidewalk at [253] the bottom of three steps which led from a brick-paved landing at the front of the plaintiff's house: and there was no place of egress from the house to the street other than by these steps. The box was so situated about midway of the steps that, in order to go from the lowest step to the sidewalk, it was necessary to go either to the right or to the left, which it would have been safe to do, or to take an unusually long step, at all events, unusually long for the female plaintiff, in order to step over the box and clear it. It was about 4 inches square, projecting irregularly above the level of the street, and was without covering of any kind; and its condition was known to the District authorities, for the inspector of plumbing, who had come to the house at the plaintiff's request to inspect the plumbing, had made some remark to her about it. It was in the same dangerous condition at the time of the commencement of the plaintiff's occupancy of the house, about nine months before the accident, and so remained without change. And it may be added that it was visible from the door of the plaintiff's house.

"It appeared in evidence that a lady had stumbled over the obstruction in the early summer of 1899, and that the plaintiff herself had stumbled over it once before, although, as she testified, she always tried to be careful and usually went to one side or the other, and not over the box, for which as she knew, an unusually long stride was necessary.

"On the day of the accident mentioned in the declaration the plaintiff was going out to visit a neighbor in an adjacent house. She testifies that from the time she left her door she had the box in view a part of the time, and had it in mind all the time, and remembered its dangerous character; but that on this occasion she attempted to step over it, instead of going to one side, did not take a sufficiently long step, and put her foot into the hole and was thrown, with the result that she suffered serious injury. This is the substance of her testimony in the case, which is set out more in detail in the bill of exceptions. But into that detail it is unnecessary for us here to enter."

[254] *We think the facts thus recited were undisputed, except as regards the statement that it would have taken "an unusually long step, at all events, unusually long for the female plaintiff, in order to step over the box and clear it." True, a statement to that effect was made by the injured woman while under cross-examination, but she subsequently qualified this by saying that she "judged" that she would have to take an unusually long step to pass over the box. The defendant, moreover, introduced testimony, as to which there was no dispute, concerning the situation of the water box and its dimensions, by which it was shown that the north, that is, the outer, side of the water box was 4 inches from a line drawn from the tread of the step nearest the sidewalk to the ground. The undisputed testimony, therefore, was not that it would require an unusually long step, or, at all events, one unusually long for plaintiff, to clear the water box, but that she judged it would require such a step on her part, descending from an elevation, to clear the box, although to do so would have required the making of a step covering but a distance of 4 inches. Were the undisputed facts, as thus corrected, of such a nature as to compel every reasonable mind to draw the inference that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence?

To determine the answer proper to be given to this question requires an ascertainment of the extent of the care which the law exacted under the conditions shown by the undisputed facts in the case.

The extent of the legal duty which the court below deemed rested upon the plaintiff must be ascertained from the following and only passage referring to the subject contained in its opinion:

"The case is, in some respects, a very meritorious case. The injured plaintiff has stated the circumstances most fairly and honestly, and her testimony is worthy of all commendation. She was almost lured to her injury by the continued neglect of the District to remove the dangerous ob-

[255]struction, which *was only one specimen of many such obstructions occurring to the common knowledge of all citizens in the streets and highways of this city, and which could be removed by reasonably careful inspection and at a greatly less cost than the amount of any one verdict against the District that has been recovered in any such case. Nevertheless, despite the fact that the negligence of the District has been great and is almost confessed on the record, we can find no difference in principle between this case and that of District of Columbia v. Brewer, 7 App. D. C. 113, upon the authority of which the court below proceeded. See also the case of Kelly v. Doody, 116 N. Y. 575, 22 N. E. 1084.

"In pursuance of the decision in the Brewer Case, and leaving the parties to their ultimate appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, we must affirm, with costs, the judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in the premises."

As the rule of law which the court deemed to be applicable was thus stated solely by reference to a prior case which the court had decided, that case must be examined to determine whether the extent of the duty which the court was of opinion rested upon the plaintiff in this case was correctly defined. District of Columbia v. Brewer—the case referred to—was decided in 1895. 7 App. D. C. 113. The case was this: The property owners on Brown street had constructed along a side of that street, where there was no paved sidewalk, a board walk. After the erection of this structure the District of Columbia graded the street, so that the bed of the street was lower than the board sidewalk by about 10 inches. When this grading was done, at the request of the property owners the board walk was left undisturbed. One of the residents of the street made a driveway from his premises to the street, cutting out for such purpose a space through the board walk 10 feet wide. On a winter night, snow being on the ground, Brewer, the plaintiff in the case, was on his way to his home, which could have been reached by another street than the one on which the board walk was situated. Brewer knew the *situation of the [256] board walk above grade and the cut through it for the private roadway. As, however, the street upon which the board walk existed was lighted, and the other street was not, and as there was less snow on the board walk than in the center of the street, Brewer chose to use the lighted street, and in doing so to walk along the board walk, instead of going into the middle of the street. On arriving at the commencement of the board walk he stepped up thereon, and on reaching the point where the board walk had been cut for the driveway he fell and suffered the injury for which he sought compensation. There was a verdict in his favor. The appellate court, after saying that the proof clearly established negligence on the part of the District of Columbia, approached the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. It pointed out that the plaintiff knew of the dangerous condition of the board walk when he chose to go along it, and the magnitude of the risk which was taken by him in using the board walk in the nighttime, with the snow on it, was referred to. The court then described what took place at the moment when Brewer suffered the fall at the place where the roadway had been cut, and observed (p. 116): "A similar accident might have befallen him had he slipped at some other point and fallen from the raised board walk." This remark would tend to indicate that it was deemed that the board walk from its elevation above the grade, with snow on it, was equally dangerous at all points, to the knowledge of Brewer, as it was at the driveway. The statements previously referred to were, however, immediately followed by this:

"But, be that as it may, he deliberately took the risk of walking along this dangerous sidewalk, and received his injury in so doing. As this plainly appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff himself, who seems to have testified with perfect fairness, and there was no other evidence, the court should have instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant."

From this analysis of the opinion in the Brewer Case, we find it difficult to say precisely upon what theory the ruling there [257] *made was treated as decisive of this case.

We say this for the reason that the conclusion of the court in that case would seem to have been placed upon the very dangerous condition of the street and the extreme hazard arising from its use under the circumstances, thus precluding every reasonable inference that Brewer could, consistently with ordinary prudence, have elected to use the street at the time and under the conditions shown by the undisputed proof. It is insisted, however, that the Brewer Case was held by the court below to be applicable to this, because it was deemed that it had been decided in that case that where a defect existed in a highway, and was known to one who elected to use such highway, such election, even if it were justified by the dictates of ordinary prudence, nevertheless must be held, as a matter of law, to entail the consequences of a want of ordinary care and prudence. And this proposition substantially embodies the asserted principle of law which was relied upon at bar as sustaining the judgment below.

We are of the opinion, however, that the rule as thus contended for is unfounded in reason and unsupported by the weight of authority. When analyzed, the proposition comes to this, that no person can, as a matter of law, without assuming all the risk, use the streets of a municipality where he knows of a defect therein, even although it be that, in the exercise of a sound judgment, it might be deemed that with ordinary care and prudence the street could be used with safety. The result of admitting the doctrine would be to hold that all persons in making use of the public streets assumed all risks possibly to arise from every known defect or danger. That this is the result of the proposition may be aptly illustrated. Take a street across which runs a railroad track, whereon cars are moved by steam or other motive power. All persons knowing of this fact would know also that there was some danger in crossing. They, therefore, must either abstain altogether from crossing, or, if they do so, be subject, as a matter of law, to the consequence of the reckless operation *of the railway, without reference [258] to the care exercised in the use of the street for the purpose of crossing. Indeed, the proposition would imply that everyone who used the public streets with the knowledge of a defect existing therein would be guilty, if an injury was by them suffered as a result of such defect, of contributory negligence, without the existence of any neglect whatever; for this would necessarily result from saying that one who had made a careful use of the streets was yet guilty of neglect in doing so. Reduced to its last analysis, the principle contended for but asserts that the ordinary rules by which negligence is to be determined do not apply to the use of the public streets, since those who use such streets with a knowledge of a possible danger to arise from a defect therein must, as a matter of law, have negligence imputed to them, although in choosing to make use of the streets, and in the mode of use, the fullest possible degree of judgment and care was exercised. The result of this would be to relieve the municipality of all duty and consequent responsibility concerning defects in highways, provided only it chose to give notice of the existence of the defects.

There may undoubtedly be found in some of the adjudged cases concerning the right to recover for damage suffered from the neglect of a municipality to repair a highway, expressions which lend support to the proposition relied on, and it may be true to say, also, that there are some cases which seem to directly support the contention. But, as we have shown, such a doctrine is inconsistent with reason, and, as we shall now proceed to point out, is in conflict with what we deem to be the weight of authority. In Dewire v. Bailey, 131 Mass. 169, 41 Am. Rep. 219, the action was brought to recover from the owner of a building for damages occasioned to one who had fallen on a plank sidewalk covered with snow and ice, on his way out of the building. The proposition was that the injured person knew of the existence of the snow and ice on the walk, and therefore, by electing to use it, assumed the risk, and was, as a matter of law, conclusively presumed to be deemed guilty *of contributory negligence. In reviewing this contention, the court, through Field, J., said (p. 170, Am. Rep. p. 219):

"The rulings of the justice presiding at the trial all rest upon the proposition that knowledge on the part of the plaintiff, at the time he entered upon the sidewalk, of the accumulation of snow and ice and of the unsafe condition of the sidewalk resulting therefrom, is in law conclusive evidence that he was not in the exercise of due care in attempting to pass over the sidewalk.

"Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295, was an action by a tenant of a part of a building against the landlord to recover for injuries received in consequence of the giving way of one of the steps of a staircase used in common by the tenants, for the safe condition of which the landlord was responsible; and it was held 'that the fact, if proved, that the plaintiff had previous knowledge that the stairs were in a dangerous condition, would not be conclusive evidence that the plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care;' and Whittaker v. West Roylston, 97 Mass. 273, and Reed v. Northfield, 13 Pick. 94, 23 Am. Dec. 662, are cited. Other recent cases to the same effect are George v. Haverhill, 110 Mass. 506; Whitford v. Southbridge, 119 Mass. 564; Lyman v. Amherst, 107 Mass. 339; Mahoney v. Metropolitan R. Co. 104 Mass. 73; Thomas v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 100 Mass. 156; Worden v. New Bedford, 131 Mass. 23, 41 Am. Rep. 185."

The court further said:

"In Mahoney v. Metropolitan R. Co. 104 Mass. 73, it was held 'that the fact that the plaintiff saw the obstruction created by the defendant, and knew its dangerous character, is not conclusive proof that he was negligent in attempting to pass it. A person who, in the lawful use of a highway, meets with an obstacle, may yet proceed if it is consistent with reasonable care so to do; and this is generally a question for the jury, depending upon the nature of the obstruction and all the circumstances surrounding the party. In the case at bar, if the plaintiff had reasonable cause to believe that he could pass the *obstruction in safety, and used reasonable care in the attempt, he is entitled to recover.'

"It is evident that an obstruction may be of such a character that a court can say, as a matter of law, that no person in the exercise of reasonable prudence would attempt to pass over it; but the accumulation of snow and ice, such as is described in the exceptions in this case, does not, in our opinion, constitute such an obstruction. . . .

"We think the law in a case of this kind is that only when the nature of the obstruction is such that the court can say that it is not consistent with reasonable prudence and care that any person having knowledge of the obstruction should proceed to pass over it in the manner attempted, can the court rule that such knowledge prevents the plaintiff from maintaining his action; and that the nature of the obstruction in this case, as shown by the exceptions, was such that it ought to have been submitted to the jury to determine whether the plaintiff, even if he knew the condition of the sidewalk at the time he attempted to pass over it, was, under the circumstances, in the exercise of reasonable prudence and due care in attempting to pass over it in the manner he did."

And the principle announced in the cases just referred to was substantially reiterated in Pomcroy v. Westfield, 154 Mass. 462, 28 N. E. 899; Fitzgerald v. Connecticut River Paper Co. 155 Mass. 155, 29 N. E. 464; Coffin v. Palmer, 162 Mass. 192, 38 N. E. 509; and Shipley v. Proctor, 177 Mass. 498, 59 N. E. 119.

Although in New York the burden in negligence cases is cast upon the plaintiff to show affirmatively his observance of due care, the rule for determining the existence of contributory negligence is like that which was declared in the Massachusetts cases just cited. In Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs, 104 N. Y. 459, 11 N. E. 43, the damage sued for was occasioned by a fall sustained in attempting to pass over an embankment of snow and ice which had accumulated upon the sidewalk. The defendant requested the court in effect to charge the jury that if the plaintiff saw the obstruction, and chose to attempt *to pass over it, [261] and not go around it, she could not recover. The action of the trial judge in refusing to give such instruction was approved by the court of appeals, that court saying (p. 469, N. E. p. 47):

"The charge of the judge sufficiently laid down the rule of law as to plaintiff's contributory negligence, and it would not have been proper for the judge to charge, as matter of law, that it was negligence for the plaintiff, under the circumstances disclosed in this case, to attempt to pass over the embankment. Evans v. Utica, 69 N. Y. 166, 25 Am. Rep. 165; Brusso v. Buffalo, 90 N. Y. 679; McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 303, 43 Am. Rep. 668; Bullock v. New York, 99 N. Y. 654, 2 N. E. 1.

The case just referred to was approved and followed in Shook v. Cohoes, 108 N. Y.

648, 15 N. E. 531. And also, in Weston v. Troy, 139 N. Y. 281, 34 N. E. 780, it was declared by the court:

"If she [the plaintiff] discovered the ridge, she was not required to leave the sidewalk, but she might, without being subjected to the charge of negligence, using due care, have kept on her way. But she could not heedlessly disregard the precautions which the obvious situation suggested, and proceed as though the sidewalk was free and unobstructed."

Quite recently, in a case decided October 6, 1903, and not yet officially reported (Walsh v. Central New York Teleph. & Teleg. Co. [N. Y.] 68 N. E. 146), the doctrine of the previous cases was recognized and applied.

The cases which are stated in the margin^[262] enforce, in substance, *the principle enunciated in the Massachusetts and New York cases just referred to.

We take from a few of those cases some pertinent passages. In Gerdes v. Christopher & S. Architectural Iron & F. Co. 124 Mo. 347, 24 S. W. 557, 27 S. W. 615, the rule was thus tersely stated:

"It is the duty of a traveler on a public street to exercise reasonable care; but it is held that the use of a street known to be defective or obstructed cannot be charged as negligence in law."

In Sandwich v. Dolan, 141 Ill. 430, 31 N. E. 416, the principle was thus stated:

"These instructions were properly refused. They announce, in substance, the proposition that, where a party goes upon a sidewalk which he knows to be in a dangerous condition, he is thereby guilty of negligence per se. Such is not the law. Sandwich v. Dolan, 133 Ill. 177, 24 N. E. 526; Flora v. Naney, 136 Ill. 45, 26 N. E. 645; St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Miller, 138 Ill. 465, 28 N. E. 1091. The use of a sidewalk with knowledge of its dangerous condition may be evidence of negligence, but it is not negligence as a matter of law. St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Miller, 138 Ill. 465, 28 N. E. 1091. In Bloomington v. Chamberlain, 104 Ill. 268, an instruction was held to be erroneous which told the jury that 'the law required the plaintiff to go out into the street, and pass around the walk, if she knew it was defective.' Whether it is obligatory upon the plaintiff to pass over the walk known by her to be unsafe, or to pass around it upon the street, or to take the walk on the opposite side of the street, was a question which it was not the province of the court to determine as a matter of law. It is a question of fact for the jury whether, in passing over a walk known to be dangerous, instead of *taking some other route, the plaintiff is or is not in the exercise of ordinary care." Sandwich v. Dolan, 133 Ill. 177, 24 N. E. 526.^[263]

In Graham v. Oxford, 105 Iowa, 709, 75 N. W. 473, the court said:

"It is not true that one who knows of a defect in a walk is necessarily guilty of negligence if he attempt to pass over it. Much depends upon the character of the defect, the occasion for passing over it, and the care used in doing so. If a person knows of a defect in a walk, but believes that it can be passed in safety by the exercise of ordinary care, and he is justified as a reasonably prudent man in holding that belief, he is not negligent in attempting to pass over it in an ordinarily careful and prudent manner."

And the rule was well settled in the District of Columbia prior to the decision in the Brewer Case. Mr. Justice Cox, in delivering the opinion in Muller v. District of Columbia, 5 Mackey, 287, said:

"The law on the subject throws on the defendant, in an action of this kind, the onus of proving contributory negligence; and that proof is not made out by merely showing the knowledge by the complainant of the defect complained of in the highway. If the highway is wholly impassable and in such condition that no reasonable man would attempt to pass it, the plaintiff does it at his own risk. But if it is not,—and especially if it is the only access to his dwelling,—the only duty on his part is the exercise of proper care to avoid accidents; and the burden is upon the defendant, not only to show knowledge of the defect on the part of the plaintiff, but to show, affirmatively, negligence, or the omission to take the proper care."

The same view of the law was taken subsequently in Corts v. District of Columbia, 7 Mackey, 277. The opinion of the court (p. 289) cites approvingly the following passage from the opinion in the case of Prince George's County v. Burgess, 61 Md. 31, 48 Am. Rep. 88.

[264] "The simple fact of its existence, with the knowledge of the *plaintiff, was not sufficient to bar recovery. It should appear that the hole rendered the bridge practically impassable, to effect a bar because of knowledge. The hole might possibly have been avoided with ordinary care in driving, and the knowledge of its existence ought to have prevented carelessness on the part of the plaintiff, and naturally would have induced care on his part; but the onus of showing that such care and prudence were not exercised still rested on the defendants."

The principle laid down in all these authorities harmonizes with the English rule as announced in the case of Clayards v. Dethick, 12 Q. B. 439. That case is thus digested in Pollock on Torts (p. 388):

"The plaintiff was a cab owner. The defendants, for purpose of making a drain, had opened a trench along the passage which afforded the only outlet from the stables occupied by the plaintiff to the street. The opening was not fenced, and the earth and gravel excavated from the trench were thrown up in a bank on that side of it where the free space was wider, thus increasing the obstruction. In this state of things the plaintiff attempted to get two of his horses out of the mews. One he succeeded in leading out over the gravel, by the advice of one of the defendants then present. With the other he failed, the rubbish giving way and letting the horse down into the trench. Neither defendant was present at that time. The jury were directed 'that it could not be the plaintiff's duty to refrain altogether from coming out of the mews merely because the defendants had made the passage in some degree dangerous; that the defendants were not entitled to keep the occupiers of the mews in a state of siege till the passage was declared safe, first creating a nuisance and then excusing themselves by giving notice that there was some danger; though, if the plaintiff had persisted in running upon a great and obvious danger, his action could not be maintained.' This direction was approved. Whether the plaintiff had suffered by the defendants' negligence, or by his [265] own *rash action, was a matter of fact and of degree properly left to the jury; 'the whole question was whether the danger was so obvious that the plaintiff could not with common prudence make the attempt.'"

Concluding, as we do, that the fact that the plaintiff, when she elected to descend the steps from her residence to reach the sidewalk, had knowledge of the existence of the uncovered water box at the foot of the steps, was not alone sufficient to charge her with contributory negligence as a matter of law, it follows that the judgment below was erroneous if it rested upon such theory. But as the knowledge of the existence of the defective water box would have been sufficient to impute contributory negligence per se, as a matter of law, if the hazard resulting therefrom to one seeking to pass over it from the steps was so great that no reasonably prudent person would have made the attempt, it remains only to consider the case in that aspect. Of course, from that point of view the question is, Did the facts proved as to the situation of the water box and the attempt of the plaintiff to step across it from the stoop so conclusively give rise to the inference of a want of ordinary care in making the attempt that no reasonable mind could draw a contrary conclusion? This question is readily answered when it is seen that the undisputed fact was that the water box at its outer edge was only about 4 inches from a line drawn from the tread of the step nearest the sidewalk to the ground. Whilst it is true that the undisputed proof was that the plaintiff was aware of a danger from the box when she sought egress from her residence, and judged that a longer step than usual would be required to cross over it, it cannot be in reason said that all reasonable minds must draw the conclusion that contributory negligence necessarily, as a matter of law, resulted from the act of attempting to step over the box to the sidewalk. This is especially so in view of the undisputed testimony given by the plaintiff that she was keeping the water box in mind, and was exercising all possible care, and had on previous occasions safely stepped over the *box. [266] This condition of proof, we think, made a case proper to be passed upon by the jury.

The conclusion just stated is not affected by the contention that when the plaintiff reached the tread of the last step she might, by stepping to one side or the other, have avoided the water box, and therefore, as she elected to cross over the box, she was guilty of contributory neglect. This but reiterates in another form the proposition that by electing to use the steps to reach the sidewalk, with knowledge of the existence of the water box, contributory negligence as a matter of law resulted. The act of attempting to step from the tread of the last step over the water box is to be tested by the general principle governing the right to use a highway with knowledge of a defect therein. Coming to apply such principle, the question is this, Was the situation of the water box and the hazard to result from an attempt to step over it so great that the plaintiff, with the knowledge of the situation, could not, as a reasonably prudent person, have elected to step across the box, instead of stepping to the sidewalk from either side of the tread of the last step? And this, we think, was, under the undisputed proof, a question for the jury, and not for the court.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is reversed, with instructions to that court to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and to grant a new trial.

RAPHAEL TUCK & SONS CO., Limited.

Copyright—affixing untruthful notice in foreign country—error in admission of testimony, when not reviewable.

1. The act of affixing in a foreign country to a publication a false statement that it was copyrighted under the laws of the United States is not within the provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4963 (26 Stat. at L. 1109, chap. 565, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3412), as amended by the act of March 3, 1891, imposing a penalty for untruthfully impressing notice of copyright upon an article which was the subject of copyright in the United States.
2. Error, if any, committed by a trial court in the admission of proof is not reviewable in the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error to a circuit court of appeals, where no error concerning the admission or rejection of testimony was assigned in the latter court, which considered the case upon the assumption that the correctness of the rulings of the lower court in this regard was unchallenged.

Argued November 11, 12, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York, entered upon a verdict directed for the defendant in a suit for the statutory penalty imposed for affixing a false notice of copyright to a publication. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 C. C. A. 508, 115 Fed. 85.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. Bell Malcomson argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Harold Binney argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Louis C. Raegener and S. L. Moody, filed a brief for defendant in error.

Contentions of counsel sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 4963 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1891 [26 Stat. at L. 1109, chap. 565, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3412] relating to the notice of copyright to be affixed to copyrighted articles, provided as follows:

"Every person who shall insert or impress such notice, or words of the same purport, in or upon any book, map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, engraving, or photograph, or other article, for which he has not obtained a copyright, shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars, recoverable one half for the person who shall sue for such penalty, and one half to the use of the United States."

*On March 3, 1897, the foregoing provisions were amended (29 Stat. at L. 694, chap. 392, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3412), by the following:

"Every person who shall insert or impress such notice, or words of the same purport, in or upon any book, map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, print, cut, engraving, or photograph or other article, whether such article be subject to copyright or otherwise, for which he has not obtained a copyright, or shall knowingly issue or sell any article bearing a notice of United States copyright which has not been copyrighted in this country; or shall import any book, photograph, chromo, or lithograph or other article bearing such notice of copyright or words of the same purport, which is not copyrighted in this country, shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars, recoverable one half for the person who shall sue for such penalty and one half to the use of the United States; and the importation into the United States of any book, chromo, lithograph, or photograph, or other article bearing such notice of copyright, when there is no existing copyright thereon in the United States, is prohibited; and the circuit courts of the United States, sitting in equity, are hereby authorized to enjoin the issuing, publishing, or selling of any article marked or imported in violation of the United States copyright laws, at the suit of any person complaining of such violation: Provided, That this act shall not apply to any importation of or sale of such goods or articles brought into the United States prior to the passage hereof."

The state of the law prior to 1897, pertinent to this case, was therefore this: A penalty was imposed of $100 for untruthfully impressing upon an article which was subject to be copyrighted in the United States the fact that the same had been copyrighted, but there was no provision or penalty concerning the importation from a foreign country of an article which was untruthfully stamped in such country as having been copyrighted in the United States, and no express provision or penalty concerning the sale of an article in the United States which was untruthfully stamped as copyrighted. The amendment *of 1897 caused the previous provision as to untruthfully stamping a notice of copyright to apply, although the article was not subject to copyright under the law of the United States, and prohibited the importation of an article untruthfully stamped from a foreign country, and also prohibited the sale of an article in the United States which was falsely stamped, the penalty previously provided being made applicable to the added prohibitions.

The plaintiff in error in 1898 commenced this action in the circuit court of the United States against the defendant in error, to recover the $100 penalty, provided in the statute, for each of eighty-three alleged distinct violations of the statute. The basis of the first to the seventieth cause of action was asserted to be that on or about the 1st day of August, 1896, the defendant, "at the city of New York, in the state of New York, did publish and issue a certain picture book or booklet" (a distinct article being named in the statement of each of the seventy distinct causes of action), "and in and upon said book did knowingly insert and impress a false and fictitious notice that the same was copyrighted . . ." The seventy-first and seventy-second causes of action charged that the defendant on the 11th day of June, 1897, in the city of New York, "did knowingly issue and sell a certain picture book," described therein, with a false notice of copyright stamped on it. The seventy-third to the eighty-third and last cause of action charged the commission as to different publications, of like acts, in the city of New York on or about April 26, 1897.

On the trial to a jury the defendant admitted that all the publications referred to had on them an untruthful statement that they had been copyrighted under the laws of the United States, which statement had been affixed in a foreign country at their request and for their account. It was also proved by the defendant, without conflict in the testimony, that all the publications having on them the untruthful statement of copyright were imported into the United States prior to the enactment of the amendment of 1897. Under this state of *the proof[270] the trial court instructed a verdict for the defendant. Error was prosecuted by the plaintiff to the circuit court of appeals, and that court affirmed the judgment. 53 C. C. A. 508, 115 Fed. 85. The court held that the penal provisions of the law had no extraterritorial operation, and therefore did not embrace the act of affixing in a foreign country to a publication a false statement that it was copyrighted under the laws of the United States. Concerning the sales made after the passage of the amendment of 1897, the court held that the trial court had correctly instructed the jury that as the books so sold after the amendment of 1897 were imported into the United States prior thereto, the right to sell them in the United States was saved by the proviso of that amendment.

The court below was clearly right in its conclusions as to the nonextraterritorial operation of the law as it stood prior to the amendment of 1897. Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 376, 27 L. ed. 968, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 263. In saying this we do not wish to be considered as holding that where an act done in a foreign country against a penal provision of the law of the United States is but the initial step in accomplishing a subsequent violation in the United States of other penal provisions, that the act done in the foreign country might not, under some circumstances, be treated as having been performed in the United States. On this question we intimate no opinion whatever, as the circumstances of the case do not require us to do so. Under the law as it stood prior to 1897 there was no provision forbidding the importation of an article falsely stamped in a foreign country, or prohibiting the sale in the United States of an article falsely stamped. There could, therefore, be no possible relation between subsequent lawful acts performed in the United States concerning the article falsely stamped in a foreign country.

The court was also manifestly right concerning the articles falsely stamped which were imported into the United States prior to the amendment of 1897, but sold in the United States subsequent to that amendment. The proviso expressly excluded from the operation of that amendment "any importation *of or sale of such goods or articles[271] brought into the United States prior to the passage hereof." Whilst this was not disputed in the argument at bar, it was insisted that the court below erred in affirming the act of the trial court in instructing a verdict on this subject, because the evidence did not unquestionably establish that the articles which were sold after March 3, 1897, were in fact imported prior to that date. To support this contention the evidence which is contained in the bill of exceptions is referred to. We are of opinion that the claim is without merit, and that from the testimony, as preserved in the bill of exceptions, it results that the trial court correctly instructed the jury on the subject.

It is urged, however, that error was committed by the trial court in the admission of proof concerning the date of the importation of the articles sold after March 3, 1897. Whilst we think the contention is without merit, we shall not review the grounds upon which it is based, because it is not open to inquiry upon the record before us. No error concerning the admission or rejection of testimony was assigned in the circuit court of appeals, and that court, in considering the case, treated it as involving only two issues,—the extraterritorial operation of the provisions of the law, as it stood prior to March 3, 1897, and the effect of the proviso which formed a part of that amendment. And this upon the assumption that the correctness of the ruling of the lower court concerning the admission of testimony was unchallenged by the plaintiff in error. We say upon the assumption, since the opinion of the court of appeals makes no reference to any question concerning the admissibility of testimony, and because the assignment of errors made for that court was directed to the adequacy of the "admissions and testimony" to sustain the action of the trial court in instructing a verdict.

Affirmed.

[272]*PEOPLE'S NATIONAL BANK OF LYNCHBURG, Appt.,
v.

MORTON MARYE, Auditor of Public Accounts of the State of Virginia.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 272-288.)

Injunction against illegal taxation—necessity of payment or tender of amount justly due.

Payment, or at least a tender, of the amount of the taxes shown from the bill on complainant's own theory justly and equitably to be due on shares of stock in a national bank, must be made before a court of equity will interfere by injunction with their collection because no notice was given of the assessment, and because such assessment, by reason of a failure to make the deduction prescribed by law, was at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital.

Argued October 14, 15, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia to review a decree dismissing a bill to restrain the collection of taxes on shares of stock in a national bank. Modified by providing that the dismissal be without prejudice, and as modified affirmed.

See same case below, 107 Fed. 570.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

This is an appeal, by the bank as complainant below, from a decree of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Virginia, dismissing its bill, with costs. 107 Fed. 570.

The complainant and three other national banks in Lynchburg, Virginia, each commenced a suit in the above-named court, against the auditor of public accounts of the state, to restrain the collection of certain taxes assessed upon the share owners of stock in the several banks, on the ground that such taxes were illegally laid. This particular complainant has brought the case here by appeal as a test case, the same questions arising in all the others.

It is insisted upon the part of complainant that the laws under which these taxes were levied are unconstitutional and *void,[273] and the prayer of the bill is that the stockholders may be relieved and discharged from all liability on account of such unpaid taxes.

The original bill, which was filed July 22, 1896, seeks to enjoin the collection of taxes upon the stock of the shareholders in the complainant bank for the years 1891 to 1895, both inclusive; and a preliminary injunction order to that effect was granted. After the filing of the original bill and on February 10, 1900, a supplemental bill was filed by leave of the court, and it was therein sought to enjoin the collection of all taxes for the years 1891 to 1897, both inclusive.

Both bills were demurred to, and the cir-

NOTE.—Necessity of payment of tax due where injunction is sought against illegal taxation.

Where injunctive relief is sought against the collection of illegal taxes by reason of the irregularity and erroneousness of the assessment, or its excessiveness, the court will refuse to inter-cuit court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the bills.

It was averred in the bills that the acts of the legislature of Virginia providing for the taxation of bank shares, both in national and state banks, were in violation of the Federal Constitution, as well as that of Virginia, and were also in violation of the act of Congress (Rev. Stat. § 5219, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3502) providing for the taxation of shares of national bank stock under state authority.

The taxes referred to in the original bill were levied under the act of Virginia passed March 6, 1890. Acts of Virginia Assembly 1890, p. 205. That act prohibited any assessment upon the capital stock of banks, either state or national, and provided for assessing the stockholders on their shares in those banks upon the market value thereof, at the same rate as is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals residing in the state. It will be observed that this rate of assessment is the condition upon which Congress, in the section of the Revised Statutes above mentioned, permits the taxation of national banks by or under state authority.

Under this Virginia act it was further made the duty of the banks to pay the amount of the tax, and if a bank failed to pay the same its cashier and his sureties were made liable for the tax and 20 per centum in addition, to be recovered by the auditor of public accounts upon notice.

But in Connors v. Detroit, 41 Mich. 128, 1 N. W. 902, the failure to tender the amount due was held not to be a ground for the refusal of relief if the claimant concedes an amount due and offers to pay it; but he will subject him-bank was also to be made against the bank itself for the same taxes as other real estate was assessed for. The ground of the alleged illegality of the taxes is stated to be the want of any provision for notice of time and place of valuation of the shares in arriving at market value, and the failure to provide for deducting the value of real estate from such market value, and also the failure to permit deductions for the debts of the shareholders.

The taxes spoken of in the original bill (1891-1895) were not paid, and no proceedings seem to have ever been taken to enforce their collection, under that act, against the cashier or his sureties. It might be surmised that they were not taken because of a doubt as to the constitutionality of that part of the act which provided for the liability of the cashier and his sureties, if the bank failed to pay the tax assessed upon its shareholders. However that may be, the authorities did not, in fact, take any proceedings to enforce the payment of the taxes until the passage of the act of March 3, 1896. Acts of Assembly of Virginia 1898, p. 700. That act provided a procedure for the collection of the taxes theretofore assessed against the stockholders of banks and then remaining unpaid. By its provisions the taxes were made a first lien upon the stock, no matter in whose hands found, and it was made the duty of the auditor of public accounts immediately to furnish the cashiers of banks with a list of their stockholders theretofore assessed with taxes upon their bank stock and who had not paid the same; and each bank so desiring and electing was authorized to pay to the auditor the taxes assessed upon the stock held by its stockholders, provided payment was made before the first day of July, 1896. If the bank did not choose to make such payment, it was made the duty of the auditor to give a copy of the lists to the attorney general, and it was made his duty to proceed by motion to collect the taxes from the individual stockholders. The motion was to be cognizable in the circuit court of Richmond city, after ten days' notice to the stockholder, and might be served upon non-resident *defendants in the mode provided [275] by § 3208 of the Virginia Code.

By the supplemental bill the taxes for the self to costs by reason of such nontender before action.

And the averment of an offer to pay the amount due was held unnecessary when the bill stated the amount to be illegal. Clement v. Everest, 29 Mich. 19.

A constitutional provision in Florida (Const. 1885, art. 9, § 8) requires payment of the legal taxes before relief against the collection of illegal taxes can be granted. But this provision does not require such payment as a prerequisite to beginning proceedings for injunctive relief against illegal taxes, but only that such payment must be made before the relief will be granted. If it is made to appear to the court that any tax is due by the applicant which it is his duty to pay before obtaining the relief sought by his application, the court should afford him an opportunity to pay the tax legally assessed, and, if not paid as required, dismiss his application. Pickett v. Russell, 42 Fla. 116, 28 So. 764.

years 1896-7 were brought under review, and a perpetual injunction was asked to restrain the collection of all taxes from 1891 to and including 1897. The assessments for the years 1896-97 were assessed under another act of the legislature of Virginia, which was also passed March 3, 1896. Acts General Assembly of Virginia 1895-96, p. 726. The 17th section of that act provided for assessments upon the shares of state and national banks at the market value of the shares of stock held in the banks at the same rate that is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals residing in the state. The act provided, also, that the banks should make a report on the 1st day of February in each year, in which should be given the names of the shareholders, the number of shares owned or held or controlled by each, the market value of the stock, and the shareholders' residences; and it was then made the duty of the commissioner of revenue, on or after the 1st day of February in each year, to assess each stockholder upon the shares of stock held or owned by him at the market value, on the 1st day of February in each year, as therein stated. The section then provided for the retention of all the dividends by the bank, and for the application of the same to the payment of the tax assessed upon such stockholders, and that each bank might, if it so elected, pay the tax so assessed against the stockholders directly to the auditor of public accounts before the 1st day of June in each year.

Provision was then made that, if the bank failed to make such payment, the auditor of public accounts was to transmit a copy of the assessment list furnished him by the commissioner of revenue, and it was made the duty of the treasurer to collect the tax therein levied, and to that end to levy upon the stock of the taxpayer.

Other provisions were made in regard to the transferring of the stock to the purchaser at the sale upon the levy made *by the treasurer, and penalties were denounced upon the bank for a refusal to comply with its provisions.

Soon after the passage of the acts of March 3, 1896, the public authorities were about to take proceedings for the purpose of enforcing the collection and payment of the taxes for the years mentioned, and thereupon this suit was brought, and a preliminary injunction obtained restraining the collection of all taxes for those years upon the bank shares until the further order of the court.

The shareholders in these four banks in the city of Lynchburg have paid no taxes on their shares of stock in those banks since 1890.

Mr. John D. Horsley argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant.

Mr. John H. Lewis also argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Wilson & Manson and Blackford, Horsley, & Blackford, filed a brief for appellant.

Mr. William A. Anderson argued the cause and filed a brief for appellee.

Contentions of counsel sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant objects to the legality of the taxes upon the ground, among others, that the acts of the Virginia legislature under which they were levied violated the provisions of the Constitution of that state, and were, therefore, entirely invalid. These objections are, as we think, untenable. They are technical, and relate to alleged defects in the titles of the acts, in not being sufficiently specific in stating the tax and the object to which it was to be applied, and also that the taxes were not equal and uniform. We think the objections are without merit, and we concur with what is stated upon this subject in the opinion of the circuit court herein. The state court has held the statutes do not violate any provision of the state Constitution, and we follow that court upon such a question. Merchants' & Mfr's. Nat. Bank v. Pennsylvania, 167 U. S. 461, 42 L. ed. 236, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829; Schaefer v. Werling, 188 U. S. 516, 47 L. ed. 570, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 449.

*The chief objections which are made to [277] the taxes are three:

1. No notice is provided for in any of the acts as to when or where the valuation of the shares of the bank for purposes of taxation will be made, and hence the shareholder has no opportunity to be heard upon that question, and the whole tax is void for that reason.

2. That the acts provide for a valuation of the bank's shares at the market value, without providing for a proportionate reduction on account of the value of the real estate owned by the bank, which is also by the law of Virginia to be assessed for its value against the bank itself; that by reason of this omission the shareholder is taxed once on the full market value of the stock, a part of which consists of the value of the real estate, and he is taxed again indirectly, for his proportion of the amount of the tax paid by the bank on this same real estate, and the result is that he is taxed upon his bank shares, as he insists, at a greater rate than upon other moneyed capital, etc.

3. That no provision is made under these acts for permitting shareholders to deduct their indebtedness from the assessments upon their shares of stock, while it is alleged the holders of large amounts of other moneyed capital are by the laws of Virginia permitted to deduct their indebtedness from that capital, and are called upon to pay taxes only upon the balance.

On these grounds the complainant insists that the taxes were illegal and void, and upon such grounds it has based its prayer that the stockholders should be wholly freed from any liability to pay such taxes or any part thereof.

The defendant under his demurrer argues that, properly construed, although notice is not in terms provided for, yet the acts do provide an opportunity for a hearing before the tax can be enforced, and also that there is no illegal discrimination in the scheme enacted by the legislature of Virginia against the holders of national bank shares and in favor of other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the state. He denies that, so far as relates to the al-[278]leged failure *to deduct the value of the real estate of the bank from the market price of the stock, or the indebtedness of the shareholder from the amount upon which such shareholder is assessed (when the provisions of the general law of Virginia upon the subject of taxation of other property are compared), there was any violation of law or any illegality in the several taxes assessed on such shares. He also insists that the complainant could not legally represent the shareholders herein, or maintain this action. He further urges that, as neither the original nor the supplemental bill showed any payment or tender of an amount which would be justly due, even under the objections of complainant, the suit could not be maintained.

The circuit court held that, as to the taxes for 1891-1895, under the two acts already mentioned (acts of 1890 and 1896), the suit could not be maintained for the reason that the bank was under no obligation to pay the taxes for its shareholders, and there was no penalty or other inconvenience to the bank attending its refusal to pay, but that the case was different under the second act of 1896 as to the assessments made after 1895, and that as to those the bank was placed in such a position under that act as permitted it to maintain the suit. The court then examined the act with reference to the averments of the bill and supplemental bill, and with regard to the general laws of Virginia relating to the taxation of other property, and concluded that the act of 1896 was valid as construed by it, and that the assessments of 1896 and 1897, under it, were legal, and therefore dismissed the bill.

In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to decide any other question than that which arises from the omission in either bill to aver payment, or at least a tender, of the amount of taxes equitably and justly due as a condition of obtaining the interference of a court of equity by enjoining the collection of the balance.

The prayer of the bill is "that the said defendant and all others may be perpetually enjoined from collecting taxes assessed on the stockholders by the state of Virginia for the *years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, [279] and 1897; that the said acts of the legislature of Virginia assessing the stockholders of your complainant with taxes may be declared unconstitutional and void, and that its stockholders, as well as your complainant, may be discharged and relieved from all liability growing out of the assessments."

From this it appears there has, in fact, never been any payment or tender of any part of the taxes assessed against the shareholders during the years above mentioned, and the omission of an averment of payment, or tender of payment, was, therefore, not a mere oversight.

In our view of the facts set forth in this case in the original and supplemental bills, the complainant was not entitled to any injunction unless it paid the amount equitably due; and if it made such payment, then the injunction would issue, restraining the collection of the balance. This is, of course, upon the assumption that the objections taken to the acts as above set forth are well founded. Whether they are or not, it is not necessary for this purpose to decide.

Taxation of shares of stocks in national banks is the universal rule, and probably there is no state in the Union in which such taxation is not provided for as a part of the property subject to taxation for the general support of the state government. The state of Virginia has by this legislation sought to provide for and enforce taxation of this kind of property. It is clearly shown that it intended to provide for a legal assessment,—one that complied with the conditions of the Federal statute, for the language of the various acts above mentioned in providing for such taxation is substantially the same as that used in the Federal statute, as they provide that the assessments shall not be on the capital of any bank, but shall be upon the shares at the same rate as is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals residing in the state. This is the purpose of the laws, and if in attempting to effect that purpose some slip is made or some details are provided for therein which may render assessments under them irregular or even [280]illegal, *that fact does not detract from the equitable duty of the shareholders in national banks to fulfil the plain demands of the laws, and pay a tax on their shares in like proportion as is assessed upon other moneyed capital, before they can establish any claim for interference in their behalf by a court of equity. To the extent (if any) that the assessment exceeds that amount, it may be assumed proper to ask a court of equity to enjoin its collection; but surely it offers no equitable foundation for an injunction restraining the collection of the whole tax, nine tenths of which may be justly due on every equitable principle.

The original and supplemental bills, taken together, show at least the amount that would be justly and equitably due on the theory of the complainant, for they show that if the two deductions (being all that are insisted upon by the complainant) had been made by the taxing officer, the complainant would not have had any ground of complaint as to the amount of the taxes. There are data in the original and supplemental bills from which it can be at once and definitely determined what the amount of the deductions claimed by complainant would be. The market value of the stock is stated for each year, as assessed by the taxing officer, and also the value of the real estate is stated for each year, and this last amount, complainant insists, should be deducted in arriving at the market value of the stock. The bills also show the different shareholders who had debts at the time the various assessments were made, and the amounts of the deductions they would, therefore, be entitled to for each of the years in controversy. These two classes of deductions being made, the complainant offers no equitable objection to taxes which might be assessed upon the balance. With these data thus appearing, from which the equitable amount of the taxes due by the shareholders is readily determined, we think this conceded amount should be paid before a court of equity ought to grant its aid by way of injunction. The universal rule of a court of equity is that he who seeks its equitable interposition must himself do equity. Is there any higher equity than [281]that a citizen *should pay the amount of a tax which he concedes to be just and equitable, before asking the aid of a court of equity to grant an injunction to enjoin the collection of any greater sum?

The complainant, however, insists that the rule does not exist where the assessments are void, and not merely irregular; and it asserts that these assessments are void because the acts under which they were laid do not provide for notice to the shareholder before determining the value of the share upon which the tax is to be laid, and also because the assessment violated the act of Congress in being at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital.

We are of opinion, however, that these assessments were not void within the meaning of the rule which absolves the taxpayer from the necessity of paying or tendering the amount equitably due from him. If there were no right to assess the particular thing at all, either because it is exempt from taxation, or because there is no law providing for the same, an assessment under such circumstances would be void, and, of course, no payment or tender of any amount would be necessary before seeking an injunction, because there could be no amount equitably due where there never had been a right to assess at all. Where, however, there is a statute which provides for an assessment, and gives jurisdiction to the taxing officer, under some circumstances, to make one, but the particular assessment is invalid for want of a notice to the taxpayer, or some other kindred objection, the equitable duty still rests upon him to pay what would be his fair proportion of the tax as compared with that laid upon other property, before he can ask the aid of the chancellor to enjoin the collection of the balance. This is the equitable rule, and it is good morals as well. To say that the act under which the tax is levied is unconstitutional, and therefore is the same as no law, and hence there is no duty to pay anything, because no tax can be levied without some law therefor, is to state the proposition too broadly. We concede that if the law were unconstitutional because, for instance, there was no constitutional *power to tax the particular [282] property, there is no necessity to pay anything. But where some part of the law may be unconstitutional because of a failure to comply with some matter of detail, but the amount which the owner of the property ought to pay is perfectly clear under the provisions of law, then if the taxpayer desire to be exempted from paying more than his share, he must pay or offer to pay his proportion, before equity will aid him in his effort to escape paying a disproportionate share.

The statute herein provides for a tax and creates the equitable obligation to pay some amount by reason of the shares, and even though there may be some obstacle which prevents its entire legality, yet the person assessed should recognize his equitable obligation to pay the tax to the extent stated, before he can base any claim for the assistance of equity to get rid of the balance of the tax. The mere lack of a provision in the statute for notice did not take away the jurisdiction of the taxing officer to make an assessment under any circumstances.

What is the purpose of notice? Clearly, that the person assessed may have an opportunity to show some reason, if any, why he should not be assessed at all, or else not so much as he has been in fact. But suppose that, although there was no notice provided for in the act, the taxpayer had nevertheless heard of the assessment, and in fact had appeared before the assessing officer and made his case, showing he should not be assessed more than a certain stated amount, and the officer had allowed his claim to its full extent. Should he be thereafter permitted to resist by means of an injunction the collection of the tax so imposed, upon the ground that the statute provided for no notice to him, and none was officially given? Certainly not. So, when he comes into a court of equity to ask its aid, should it appear, on his own statement or otherwise, that if all the claims he makes were allowed he would still equitably owe the government a certain sum by reason of the statute providing for the assessment and his ownership of the property assessed, will he be heard to insist [283] that the court *grant him an injunction preventing the collection of any tax, because he had no notice of the assessment? He owes something to the government as a tax upon his shares, and ought any court of equity to aid him in escaping all obligation because, while insisting that the whole assessment is illegal, it yet clearly appears that a portion thereof, even if uncollectible, is nevertheless equitably and justly due. Is the equitable obligation arising by reason of these statutes and under these circumstances, to pay some tax, completely obliterated because the particular tax cannot legally be collected, and may be called void? We think clearly not. This same reason applies not only to a lack of notice, but also to the case of a claim that the tax is illegal because it did not allow the deductions which by the Federal statute should have been allowed. The tax under such circumstances is not void, but, at most, voidable for the illegal amount. Albany County v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305, 315, 26 L. ed. 1044, 1051.

We refer to a few of the many authorities upon the subject.

In State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 616, 23 L. ed. 663, 674, it was said by Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, as follows:

"Before complainants seek the aid of the court to be relieved of the excessive tax, they should pay what is due. Before they ask equitable relief, they should do that justice which is necessary to enable the court to hear them. . . . It is not sufficient to say in the bill that they are ready and willing to pay whatever may be found due. They must first pay what is conceded to be due, or what can be seen to be due on the face of the bill, or be shown by affidavits, whether conceded or not, before the preliminary injunction should be granted. The state is not to be thus tied up as to that of which there is no contest, by lumping it with that which is really contested. If the proper officer refuses to receive a part of the tax, it must be tendered, and tendered without the condition annexed of a receipt in full for all the taxes assessed."

This language is used in relation to taxes which were claimed *to be too high with ref-[284]erence to other property in the state, but the principle of the rule exists even where the tax is averred to be too great, because certain deductions provided by law were not made, or because there was no notice given of the assessment, and hence the taxpayer never had an opportunity to be heard. If, after hearing, there would appear something to be equitably due from the taxpayer, he should pay it before seeking relief from the court.

In Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903, where the question was whether the rule adopted by the local boards of assessment was in conflict with the state Constitution, the court held that it was, and that an assessment made under those circumstances was illegal, but that, nevertheless, the taxpayer was bound to pay the amount equitably due; and the opinion closes with the statement that "the complainant having paid to defendant, or into the circuit court for his use, the tax which was its true share of the public burden, the decree of the circuit court enjoining the collection of the remainder is affirmed."

In German Nat. Bank v. Kimball, 103 U. S. 732, 26 L. ed. 469, the general rule was held to be that the owner of taxable property seeking to enjoin the collection of a tax thereon, which he alleges to be in excess of what is lawful, must first pay or tender so much thereof as is justly due. Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said:

"The bill attempts to evade this rule by alleging that the tax is wholly void, and therefore none of it ought to be paid, and that by reason of the absence of all uniformity of values it is impossible for any person to compute or ascertain what the stockholders of the complainant bank ought to pay on the shares of the bank."

The State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 663, were then referred to by the court, and quotations therefrom made, and the principles therein announced were held to be sufficient to decide the case at bar, thus holding that the mere fact that a tax was void for some particular reason was not ground for the interposition *of a court of equity by injunction, where it could be seen there was an equitable obligation due from the taxpayer to pay a certain conceded amount, or an amount which could easily be ascertained, and which had not been paid.

These cases in this court are sufficient to show the propriety of the rule, and that it has been followed by us whenever the opportunity arose.

The same principle has been, however, decided by many of the state courts. In Smith v. Humphrey, 20 Mich. 398, 409, Mr. Justice Cooley, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"He who comes into equity for relief must be willing to do equity; and there can be no ground upon which, in enjoining an excessive claim, the complainant can be discharged from that which is justly due. Story, Eq. Jur. § 64e, § 707; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 422. This is the rule even as between individuals; and there is at least equal reason for applying it in behalf of the state when it is seeking to collect its revenues. We have had occasion to apply it heretofore in suits to enjoin taxes. Conway v. Waverly Twp. Board, 15 Mich. 257; Palmer v. Napoleon Twp. 16 Mich. 176. See also Hersey v. Milwaukee County, 16 Wis. 185, 82 Am. Dec. 713; Bond v. Kenosha, 17 Wis. 288."

This Michigan case was one on appeal from an absolute decree perpetually enjoining a sale for unpaid taxes because of a demand of interest by the proper authorities at a rate not allowed by law. The court held that it could not be sustained, and that the payment of the amount due, with interest at the lawful rate, must be made, and then the sale would be perpetually enjoined.

In Merrill v. Humphrey, 24 Mich. 170, it was held that a property owner seeking to enjoin the collection of a tax on the ground that the amount is excessive should show by his bill, as near as may be practicable, what amount is just and what is excessive, and he should pay to the proper officer the amount which he concedes to be properly [286]*chargeable against himself. Mr. Justice Cooley, delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said (p. 175):

"We have already said that the complainant should be required to do equity as a condition of relief. What is just to the public cannot be done unless he pays within due time such proportion of the tax assessed upon him as he concedes to be fair; and we think this payment should be required by the injunction master to be made to the proper officer as a condition to the allowance of injunction. To this extent the case is within the principle of Conway v. Waverly Twp. Board, 15 Mich. 257, and Palmer v. 191 U. S.

Napoleon Twp. 16 Mich. 176, heretofore decided by us, and of several Wisconsin cases," etc.

In Steuart v. Meyer, 54 Md. 454, where it appeared that the sale of certain property in the city of Baltimore for the nonpayment of taxes was illegal in not complying with the statute, it was held (p. 468) that the complainant, as a condition of obtaining a decree setting aside the sale, must pay to the party entitled to receive it the full amount of the taxes in arrear at the time of the sale by the collector, together with the interest accrued thereon to the time of the payment, and also all taxes that had subsequently accrued due on the property, with interest.

In Alexander v. Merrick, 121 Ill. 606, 13 N. E. 190, it was held that, in accordance with the principle that a party seeking equity must do equity, a court of equity in setting aside a void tax sale as a cloud upon title would still require the complainant to refund the taxes paid by the holders of the certificates of purchase on their purchase, and also succeeding taxes to protect their purchase. In this case it was conceded that the tax sales were illegal and void, and that any deed issued by the county clerk, based upon such sales, would also be unlawful and void, but nevertheless would, on their face, appear to be valid official acts of the clerk, and would cause a cloud upon the title to the lands. At page 614 (N. E. p. 193), the court said:

"The complainant claims that the certificates of sale were clouds upon his title, and obstacles in the way of its beneficial *enjoy-[287]ment. He asks a court of equity to dissipate these clouds and remove these obstacles. He who asks equity must do equity. The court below, by its decree, should have required the complainant to refund the taxes paid by Reed and Forsythe as a condition to granting the relief prayed for. That such a requirement is proper in cases of this kind has been repeatedly held by this court."

In Morrison v. Hershire, 32 Iowa, 271, 277, an assessment for local improvements, the court refused to interfere even if the assessments were, as to one of the fronts on the street, unauthorized, unless the party complainant paid or tendered the portion legally due. The court said:

"An elementary principle of equity is applicable to the objections here presented. It is not denied that under the rule of assessment as fixed by the council, if applied as contended for by plaintiffs, certain sums are due from the lot owners which are charges upon their lots. These sums the respective plaintiffs are bound by law and in equity to pay. Before plaintiffs can claim relief as to the sums which they insist are over-assessed upon their property, they must pay or offer to pay the sums lawfully and justly due according to their own theory of the assessment; for he who seeks equity must do equity; but this plaintiffs have not done."

And on page 278:

"We understand that it is a settled rule in equity that where a party is in conscience bound to pay a certain sum of money which, together with an amount that he is not legally bound to pay, is brought as a legal claim against him, equity will not restrain the collection of the whole, unless he pay or offer to pay, by tender, the sum which he justly and legally owes."

The rule requiring payment of the sum equitably due cannot be too rigorously enforced in cases regarding payment of taxes. This rule does not assume the validity of the assessment for that sum, but it simply says that under the circumstances the taxpayer shall have no right to come into court and enjoin the payment of any tax when the amount which, *equitably, he ought to pay is easily and certainly determinable from the conceded facts in the case.

In the case at bar because certain deductions were not made, although there was a large sum assessable even if the deductions were allowed, the injunction granted has prevented the collection of any part of the assessments, and for twelve years the stockholders in these Lynchburg banks have paid not one dollar of taxes by reason of their ownership of such shares. This is inequitable and unjust, and a court of equity should not be made the instrument by which such injustice is continued.

Although we reach the conclusion above stated on the ground we have discussed, it is not to be inferred that we regard the other grounds untenable. We intimate no opinion in regard to them. To the end that complainant may, if it so elect, pay as provided in this opinion, and then commence further proceedings, the dismissal of the bill will be without prejudice, and as thus modified the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Federal equity jurisdiction—suit to cancel insurance policy for fraud—remedy at law.

1. Lack of an adequate remedy at law in the same jurisdiction cannot successfully be urged to sustain the equitable jurisdiction of a Federal court of a suit to cancel an insurance policy for fraud, when the insurance company, because of diversity of citizenship, might have removed the action brought on such policy in a state court to a Federal court, where the fraud could have been set up as a defense, although by exercising this right of removal the company might have subjected itself to a revocation of its license to do business in the state, or, at least, to litigation to prevent the state authorities from revoking it.
2. Equitable jurisdiction of a suit to cancel an insurance policy for fraud which the insurance company could set up as a defense to an action on the policy cannot be founded on the theory that the company would not have the same control of the case as a defendant that it would have as plaintiff.
3. The fact that the law is more favorable to insurance companies as administered in the Federal than in the state courts furnishes no reason for the assumption by a Federal court of equitable jurisdiction over a suit by an insurance company to cancel a policy for fraud, although diversity of citizenship exists.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois decreeing the cancellation of a policy of insurance for the fraud of the agents of the insured. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill without prejudice.

See same case below, 49 C. C. A. 216, 111 Fed. 19.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

This case comes here upon certiorari, applied for by the petitioner, who was the administratrix of the estate of Herman D. Cable, deceased. 186 U. S. 482, 47 L. ed. 1185, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 855. The suit was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois by complainant, the United States Life Insurance Company, of the city of New York and a citizen of that state, against Alice A. Cable, a citizen of the state of Illinois, to have a certain policy of insurance for $50,000, payable as therein stated, upon the life of the said Herman D. Cable, delivered up for cancelation, on the ground that the same had been procured by the fraud of the agents of the deceased. The bill averred that the complainant was an insurance company of New York, lawfully engaged in doing business throughout the United States, and particularly in Illinois, under a permit or license duly granted therefor; that it had issued its policy upon the life of Herman D. Cable, and that it was procured by the fraud and fraudulent representations of his agents, such fraud and fraudulent representations being set forth at length; also that defendant had commenced a suit in the state court of Illinois to recover upon the policy, which suit was instituted about one and a half hours prior to the filing of complainant's original bill. A supplemental and amended bill was filed, in which, among other things, it was alleged:

On cancellation of a deed or contract in equity for fraud, concealment, or misrepresentation—see note to Neblett v. Macfarland, 23 L. ed. U. S. 471.

[290] "10. Your orator further avers that the Constitution and laws of the United States of America confer upon your orator the right to remove into this court said action at law so begun against your orator; that, on the other hand, the state of Illinois, by legislative enactment, has sought to prevent the removal to this court by insurance companies of actions similar to said action so begun by said administratrix, and has practically destroyed such right or made its exercise impracticable, by providing, in substance, that an insurance company shall forfeit and lose its right to do business in the state of Illinois upon removing any such action into this court; that by removing said action to this court your orator might lose its right to transact business in the state of Illinois, and would certainly become involved in serious controversy with said state respecting the transaction of any subsequent business by your orator in said state; that the laws of said state upon certain questions of general insurance law, as interpreted by its highest legal tribunal, and applicable to the facts in this case, are somewhat different from the laws of the United States as interpreted by the Federal courts, upon the same questions, and from the standpoint of the laws of the United States are unduly and erroneously adverse to insurance companies; that your orator is entitled to an application of the law according to the decisions of the Federal courts; and that under the facts and circumstances hereinbefore set forth in this bill, your orator is without a due and proper remedy at law in respect to the claim of said administratrix under said policy of insurance, but is without any remedy at law whatever in this court."

To this bill the defendant interposed a demurrer, among other things, for want of equity, and that demurrer was sustained by the circuit court, but upon appeal to the circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit the decree sustaining the demurrer was overruled, and the case remanded to the circuit court. 39 C. C. A. 264, 98 Fed. 761.

An answer was then put in by the administratrix of Cable's estate, denying any[291] fraud, and averring that she had, before the suit in the Federal court was commenced, herself commenced an action upon the policy in a proper state court of Illinois, and that it was her intention and desire to push such action to a speedy conclusion if permitted by the Federal court.

The suit herein was tried and a decree entered that the policy was procured on behalf of the deceased by constructive fraud, and that no actual fraud was intended or practised in the delivery of the same, and it was thereupon decreed that the policy should be delivered up and canceled. The defendant appealed from such decree to the circuit court of appeals, and the complainant took a cross appeal so as to bring up the findings of fact as to the constructive fraud, so that, as counsel said, "the case might be heard and considered in the circuit court of appeals upon the whole evidence, regardless of the findings of the master and of the circuit court." This was done for the reason that, in counsel's belief, the evidence showed a deliberate and intentional concealment on the part of Lord, the agent of the deceased, and therefore a plain fraud perpetrated by such agent. The circuit court of appeals affirmed the judgment [44 C. C. A. 216, 111 Fed. 19], and upon application this court granted the writ of certiorari as stated.

Mr. W. S. Oppenheim argued the cause, and, with Mr. H. H. C. Miller, filed a brief for petitioner:

Where a suit at law is brought against an insurance company for a loss sustained under an insurance policy, a court of chancery has no jurisdiction to cancel the policy, since every ground set forth in the bill of complaint can be set up and tried as a defense in the action at law.

A foreign insurance company has no right to do business in the state without license, and contracts entered into by it are controlled by the statutes of the state.

New York L. Ins. Co. v. Cravens, 178 U. S. 389, 44 L. ed. 1116, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962.

The statute of the state under which the respondent was licensed does not forbid a removal to the Federal court of suits brought against it in the state court, but simply reserves the right to revoke the license issued under the written agreement given by respondent to the state if it does not submit its controversies to the judgment of the state courts, and stand upon the same footing as domestic companies. This statute is constitutional, and the agreement made by respondent under which it procured its license is valid and binding.

Mr. William G. Beale argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Buell McKeever, Gilbert E. Porter, and Charles E. Patterson, filed a brief for respondent:

What is meant by a "plain, adequate, and complete" remedy at law is a remedy equally effectual with the equitable remedy as to all the rights of the complainant, and as practical and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration.

Lewis v. Cocks, 23 Wall. 466, 23 L. ed. 70.

It is a remedy which, both in respect to the final relief and the mode of obtaining it, is as efficient as the remedy which equity would confer under the same circumstances.

S. 24, 46 L. ed. 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 5.

The existence of the statute, and the attitude of the state authorities with respect to it, were a menace to respondent, made its right of removal valueless, and deprived it of its plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law.

Lewis v. Cocks, 23 Wall. 466, 23 L. ed. 70; Root v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189, 26 L. ed. 975; Kilbourn v. Sunderland, 130 U. S. 505, 32 L. ed. 1005, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; *Smith v. As respondent did not have the proper remedy at law in the Federal court, it is immaterial whether he had such a remedy in a state court. The equitable jurisdiction of the Federal courts does not depend, and cannot be made to depend, upon the adequacy of proceedings at law in the state courts.

Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252, Fed. Cas. No. 1,174; Breeden v. Lec, 2 Hughes, 484, Fed. Cas. No. 1,828; Maycr v. Foulkrod, 4

Wash. C. C. 349, Fed. Cas. No. 9,341; Coler v. Stanley County, 89 Fed. 257; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Cornell, 110 Fed. 816; National Surety Co. v. State Bank, 61 L. R. A. 394, 56 C. C. A. 657, 120 Fed. 593; Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 150 U. S. 202, 37 L. ed. 1052, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 75; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418. See also Stanton v. Embry, 46 Conn. 595.

Otherwise state legislation, by extending legal remedies, might destroy all equitable jurisdiction on the part of Federal courts. The jurisdiction and procedure in the Federal courts of law and of equity depend upon essential principles and distinctions as understood and applied by the Federal courts themselves.

Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252, Fed. Cas. No. 1,174; Mayer v. Foulkrod, 4 Wash. C. C. 349, Fed. Cas. No. 9,341; Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. 212, 4 L. ed. 372; Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 150 U. S. 202, 37 L. ed. 1052, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 75; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418.

Nor did respondent have a plain, adequate, and complete remedy in the state courts of Illinois, because it could not have its controversy with petitioner properly decided there in accordance with correct principles of general insurance law as understood and applied by this court, and because it might not have been able to interpose in an action at law the defense that the policy had been procured by fraud. This shows the peculiar value of the right to be in the Federal court.

The substantial questions involved are questions of general law upon which the Federal courts exercise their own judgment, independently of state decisions.

Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Gloucester Ins. Co. v. Younger, 2 Curt. C. C. 338, Fed. Cas. No. 5,487; Maier v. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. 24 C. C. A. 239, 47 U. S. App. 322, 78 Fed. 566; Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Reliance M. Ins. Co. 27 C. C. A. 134, 50 U. S. App. 231, 82 Fed. 296.

If the views of the supreme court of Illinois in applying such principles differ from those of this court, any supposed remedy to respondent founded upon such different and erroneous views would not be an adequate remedy, but would in fact be no remedy at all.

See Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252, Fed. Cas. No. 1,174.

It is settled in this court that a mere solicitor, or a local agent of a life insurance company, cannot bind his company affirmatively or by waiver, through his agreements or knowledge, when plain and appropriate limitations and restrictions upon his authority are brought to the attention of an applicant for insurance by being embodied in the application.

Davis v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 13 Blatchf. 462, Fed. Cas. No. 3,642; Paine v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 2 C. C. A. 459, 10 U. S. App. 256, 51 Fed. 689; United Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 47 L. R. A. 450, 27 C. C. A. 42, 53 U. S. App. 517, 82 Fed. 406; Koken v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 28 Fed. 705; Misselhorn v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 30 Fed. 545; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837; Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Asso. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133.

The supreme court of Illinois holds that any person who receives applications for life insurance, collects premiums, and delivers policies is authorized to waive a limitation or restriction upon his own authority contained in a policy or in an application, and to waive other provisions of the contract, and to bind the company by agreement or waiver, in connection with the act of manual delivery, without regard to the expressed limitations or restrictions.

John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schlink, 175 Ill. 284, 51 N. E. 795; Royal Neighbors v. Boman, 177 Ill. 27, 52 N. E. 264.

Under a recent decision of the supreme court of Illinois it is questionable whether the defense of fraud in procuring an insurance policy not affecting its manual execution can be made available in an action at law, or can only be made available in a suit in equity to cancel the policy.

Robinson v. Sharp, 201 Ill. 86, 66 N. E. 299.

The remedy of respondent in a state court of Illinois is, therefore, very far from being "plain" and "adequate" at law.

There had been no final and conclusive election to take the commuted value of the policy; and the possibility of a multiplicity of suits, or number of successive suits, against respondent for separate annual instalments under the policy was additional ground for invoking the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

Washington v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 136 Ill. 49, 26 N. E. 653; Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655; Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S. 347, 30 L. ed. 451, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249; Bank of Kentucky v. Stone, 88 Fed. 383; Springport v. Teutonia Sav. Bank, 75 N. Y. 397.

Resort to equity was further sustainable on the ground that respondent might lose important evidence, namely, the testimony of the witness McCabe, through lapse of time.

Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655; Schmidt v. West, 104 Fed. 272; Fuller v. Percival, 126 Mass. 381; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 700.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended upon the part of the administratrix of the estate of the assured, that the court below had no jurisdiction, on the ground that there existed a complete and adequate remedy (or defense) at law when the company was sued upon the policy, and that the effect of allowing this jurisdiction in the circuit court is to improperly deprive the defendant herein of a trial by jury.

It is conceded by the plaintiff in error that no cause of action existed in favor of the complainant herein upon the law side of the Federal court, the contention being that the company could set up, as a defense to any action brought against it in the Federal court, those allegations of fraud which, being proved, would constitute a perfect and complete defense to any action upon the policy.

[303] *The company, however, avers that the administratrix has elected not to bring her action in the Federal court, although she might have done so on the ground of diversity of citizenship, but has, instead of so doing, brought it in the state court, and hence the company would have no opportunity of setting up its defense in a Federal court in an action brought on the policy, and it insists that on that account it has not that complete and adequate remedy or defense at law, in the same jurisdiction, which it contends is necessary in such case.

It is true that the remedy or defense which will oust an equity court of jurisdiction must be as complete and as adequate, as sufficient and as final, as the remedy in equity, or else the latter court retains jurisdiction; and it must be a remedy which may be resorted to without impediment created otherwise than by the act of the party, and the remedy of defense must be capable of being asserted without rendering the party asserting it liable to the imposition of heavy penalties or forfeitures, arising other than by reason of its own act.

It is also urged, as an answer to the claim of the company as to jurisdiction, that even though the remedy or defense at law must exist in the same (Federal) jurisdiction, yet it is within the power of the company, if it see fit to do so, to remove the action in the state court to the Federal court, and thus its defense at law, while adequate, would also be within the same jurisdiction in which its suit in equity was commenced.

It is further insisted by the administratrix that it is unnecessary that an action at law should have been commenced in the same jurisdiction, but it is sufficient that the defense would be available and complete if such an action should be commenced in a Federal court of law.

As to the removal of the action from the state to the Federal court, the company avers that, even assuming it had the right so to remove, yet it insists that such removal would be too hazardous to the company by subjecting it to a possible revocation of its license to do business in the state, to be of any adequate avail.

*It is also argued upon the part of the company that the position of a defendant in an action is not so advantageous as that of a plaintiff, as the plaintiff has the conduct of a cause largely within his own control; and it is said that the law as administered in the state court is not so favorable to insurance companies as is the case in the Federal courts, and that the company had the right to an administration of the law by the Federal, instead of the state, court by reason of the diversity of citizenship.

These objections are to be considered.

In Hurd's Revised Statutes of Illinois, chap. 73, title Insurance, in relation to foreign insurance companies, it is provided that any such company must first file a written application for a license, in which it shall state that it desires to transact the business of insurance, and that it will accept a license according to the laws of the state, "and that said license shall cease and terminate in case and whenever it shall remove or make application to remove into any United States courts any action or proceeding commenced in any of the state courts of this state, upon any claim or cause of action arising out of any business transaction, in fact, done in this state," etc. The statute also provides that if any company thereafter removes or applies to remove into the United States court any action commenced in a state court of the kind above mentioned, "it is hereby made the imperative duty of the auditor of public accounts at once to revoke, cancel, and annul the license issued to such incorporated company, association, or partnership; and thereafter no such incorporated company, association, or partnership shall transact within this state any of the business for which it was incorporated, until again duly licensed. In case such revocation of license shall be made because of the removal of or the attempt to remove any action from a state court of this state to any United States court, no renewal of such license shall be made within three years after such revocation." Provision is also made that, if the license is revoked, publication of the fact shall be made in the newspapers.

[305] *This court has held that, although there may be power in a Federal court of equity in a proper case to order the delivery up and cancellation of a policy of insurance obtained upon fraudulent representations and suppression of facts, yet it will not generally do so when those representations and suppressions can be perfectly well established in a defense at law in a suit upon the policy, and it therefore affirmed a decree which dismissed, without prejudice, a bill filed for obtaining the delivery up and cancellation of a policy so issued, although the evidences of the fraud were considerable, and a suit on the policy had been begun in an action at law after the bill in equity was filed. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, 20 L. ed. 501.

That was a suit by the company to obtain the delivery up and cancellation of certain policies of life insurance after the death of the assured, on the ground that the policies had been procured by the defendant, the widow of the deceased, by fraudulent suppression of material facts, and by the misrepresentation of others of the same class. The answer denied the allegations made. It was held that the company would have a perfect defense at law in an action by the holder upon the policy of insurance, and for that reason equity would refuse to take jurisdiction of an action to compel the delivery up and cancellation of the policy. The court said:

"By the death of the cestui que vie the obligation to pay, as expressed in the policies, became fixed and absolute, subject only to the condition to give notice and furnish proof of that event within ninety days. Notice having been given and the required proof furnished, the obligation to pay certainly became fixed by the terms of the policies, and the sums insured became a purely legal demand, and if so, it is difficult to see what remedy more nearly perfect and complete the appellants can have than is afforded them by their right to make defense at law, which secures to them the right of trial by jury. Where a party, if his theory of the controversy is correct, has a good defense at law to 'a purely legal demand,' he should be left to that means of defense, as he has no [306] occasion to resort 'to a court of equity for relief, unless he is prepared to allege and prove some special circumstances to show that he may suffer irreparable injury if he is denied a preventive remedy.'"

To the same effect are Home Ins. Co. v. 191 U. S. U. S., Book 48.

Stanchfield, 1 Dill. 424, Fed. Cas. No. 6,660; Atna L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 73 Fed. 318.

Complainant insists that in this case special circumstances are shown that it may suffer irreparable injury if jurisdiction be denied. Those special circumstances have already been mentioned, and the question is whether they are sufficient to furnish ground for a Federal court of equity to take jurisdiction herein.

We start with the proposition that, to any action brought upon the policy in a Federal court, the company would have a complete and adequate defense by proving the fraud as alleged in the bill herein. That shows a defense in the same jurisdiction resorted to by the complainant herein. It is answered, however, that the action has not been commenced in the Federal court, but, on the contrary, the administratrix has commenced her action in the state court, and hence the defense, if made in the state court, is not in the same jurisdiction as that in which the bill in this case was filed. But the company may bring its defense within the same jurisdiction by removing the case from the state to the Federal court, which it has the right to do on account of the diversity of citizenship of the parties thereto. No stipulation or agreement, founded on a state statute or otherwise, which the company may have entered into, could prevent the removal of the case in the exercise of its constitutional right. This has been so held in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365; and that case has been repeatedly approved. See Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 295, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 931.

In Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148, it was held that a state had the right to impose conditions not in conflict with the Constitution nor the laws of the United States, to the transaction of business within its territory by a foreign insurance *company, and to exclude such com-[307] pany from its territory, or, having given a license, to revoke it, with or without cause; and it was further decided that an injunction to restrain a state officer from revoking and canceling a license to a foreign company to do business within the state, because the company has, contrary to the state statute, removed a case from the state to the Federal court, would not be granted, and it was remarked that, as the state had the right to exclude a foreign insurance company, the means by which she caused such exclusion, or the motives of her action, were not the subject of judicial inquiry. Whether this case has been shaken by the subsequent cases of Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 199, 30 L. ed. 915, 919, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 295, 7

Sup. Ct. Rep. 931; Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 254, 43 L. ed. 432, 437, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165, and Dayton Coal & I. Co. v. Barton, 183 U. S. 23, 25, 46 L. ed. 61, 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 5, it is not material here to discuss. It has from an early day been held that a corporation created by one state could transact business in another state only with the consent, expressed or implied, of the latter state, and that such consent might be accompanied by such conditions as the latter state might think fit to impose, provided they were not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States, or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each state free from encroachment by all others, or that principle of natural justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 407, 15 L. ed. 452; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 44 L. ed. 657, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Cravens, 178 U. S. 389, 401, 44 L. ed. 1116, 1124, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962; John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Warren, 181 U. S. 73, 76, 45 L. ed. 755, 758, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535.

One thing is entirely clear, that the company could have removed this case from the state to the Federal court, notwithstanding the state statute or anything contained in its application for a license to do business within the state. Upon removal the company would have the full and adequate defense, under the law as administered by the Federal courts, that it would have in the equity case. Whether, as a result of such removal, the state would have the right by [308] reason of the statute *to revoke the license given to the company, is not a question which it is necessary for us to here discuss or determine. But, assuming the right of removal, the company says that it may thereby subject itself to a revocation of its license, or at least to litigation to prevent the state authorities from revoking it, and it ought not to be put to any such litigation or possible injury or inconvenience.

The embarrassment attaching to the complainant herein on account of a removal, if any, is one of its own creation. As a condition upon which it was admitted to do business in the state, it voluntarily signed the application, in which it promised to accept a license according to the laws of Illinois, and agreed that the license should terminate in case the company should remove any action commenced in the state court to the United States court, as already stated. We think the existence of these facts furnishes no ground for appealing to a Federal court of equity to take jurisdiction of a suit to cancel the policy, where otherwise the court would have none. The state statute could not prevent the removal. If, because of a removal, ground was furnished for the revocation of the license, that fact would not justify a resort to a Federal court, and ought not to, because, as we have said already, the contingency is one of the complainant's own creation, and it ought not, therefore, to be able to avail itself of an embarrassment which it has voluntarily created, as a foundation for jurisdiction in a Federal court which would not otherwise exist.

It signed its application to do business, in order to come into the state and reap the profits which it thought it might earn by transacting its business in the state. There was no coercion upon it to make the application or to take the permit on the condition stated. Upon the whole, it chose to make such application and receive the license upon that condition.

If the condition be illegal and no ground for a revocation of the license, any subsequent litigation which the company may have by reason of such removal with the state officials to prevent the revocation of the license on that account is still *matter[309] caused by its own action, and cannot, in our judgment, furnish any ground for jurisdiction in the Federal courts.

Still less do we think that any foundation is laid for that jurisdiction based upon the theory that the company would not have the same control of the case as a defendant that it would as plaintiff. That is not the case in modern practice. The defendant can urge the case to trial against the desires of the plaintiff, and its defense may be shown as well and conveniently by a defendant as the cause of action may be shown by the plaintiff. The right of the plaintiff to discontinue the action does not furnish ground for equitable jurisdiction. If it did, then equity would always have jurisdiction, and the rule would be worthless.

The other ground stated as furnishing a special circumstance to show that complainant may suffer some irreparable injury if equity does not take jurisdiction,—viz., that the law is more favorable to insurance companies as administered in the Federal than in the state court, and therefore equity ought to take jurisdiction in this case, upon the ground of the diversity of citizenship,—cannot be regarded for a moment.

It is immaterial whether the assertion be conceded or denied. It furnishes no ground for equitable jurisdiction in a case like this. Where a plaintiff in a state court which has jurisdiction over the subject-matter brings the defendant properly within such jurisdiction, he is entitled to a trial of his cause in that court, unless the case be removed to a Federal court upon some constitutional ground. If that ground exist, the removal can be made, but if it do not, equitable jurisdiction does not accrue to a Federal court because it is thought the law as administered by that court more favorable to the party seeking its aid.

[310] We think that, within the rule in Phœnix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, 20 L. ed. 501, the Circuit Court has no jurisdiction in this case. The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit and of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court with directions to dismiss the bill, without prejudice.

It is so ordered.

Error to state court—conclusiveness of state court decisions—due process of law in assessments for local improvements.

1. The decision of the highest state court that the owner of property abutting on a local improvement can, by mandamus or injunction, compel a hearing by the body making the assessment, or prevent the approval of the engineer's report until such hearing has been accorded, is conclusive on the Supreme Court of the United States in reviewing a judgment of the state court, foreclosing the lien of such assessment.
2. Due process of law is afforded the owner of property assessed for a local improvement, where there is an opportunity to be heard before the body which is to make the assessment, although the decision of that body after hearing is conclusive.
3. The decision of the highest state court that, because members of the board levying an assessment for a local improvement were owners of property abutting on such improvement, and assessable therefor, would, at most, make the assessment voidable, and would not render it subject to collateral attack, is conclusive on the Supreme Court of the United States in reviewing the decision of the state court, foreclosing a lien on such assessment.
4. Due process of law is not denied an owner of property assessed for a local improvement because all the members of the board levying the assessment were residents of the town, and taxpayers thereof, and two of such members were owners of lots abutting on the improvement, and assessable therefor.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Marion Superior Court of that State, foreclosing the lien of an assessment for a local improvement. Affirmed.

See same case below, 158 Ind. 206, 62 N. E. 447.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The plaintiff in error seeks by this writ to review the judgment of the supreme court of the state of Indiana, affirming a judgment in favor of one of the defendants in error, William C. Smith, foreclosing the lien of an assessment levied upon certain real estate in the town of Irvington, belonging to the plaintiff in error. The plaintiff Smith brought this action to foreclose the lien, and alleged in his complaint that he was the contractor for the doing of the work for a local improvement on Washington street in the town mentioned, and had complied with all the provisions of the statute and with his contract, and had finished the work, and was [311] entitled to payment for the same; that an assessment to provide for such payment had been duly imposed by the board of town trustees upon the property abutting on the portion of the street where the improvement was made, and that the defendant, Sarah A. Hibben, was the owner of lots abutting on that improved portion of the street, and her assessment amounted to over $5,000, which she had not paid; that the assessment was then due with 6 per centum interest, and the plaintiff prayed that the lien might be foreclosed against her property, and that it might be sold for the satisfaction of the assessment, and for other proper relief in the premises.

The defendant Hibben demurred to the complaint, and the same having been overruled, she filed an answer thereto. She also filed a cross complaint. The answer and cross complaint set up the same facts in substance, and they both averred the unconstitutionality of the act of the legislature of Indiana providing for the improvement of streets under which the improvement in question was made, and also it was objected to the validity of the assessment that the alleged improvement was of no benefit to many of her lots, and that, on the contrary, the assessment upon such lots was greater than their value, and resulted in a substantial confiscation of her property in those lots; also that the assessment had been made by the front foot and without reference to the benefits received from the improvement, and that no hearing before the board of trustees was had and no consideration given to the question of whether or not the abutting property or any part thereof was specially benefited in an amount equal to, less than, or in excess of, the amounts fixed by the assessments which were confirmed by such board, but, on the contrary, that the assessments were made and confirmed upon the theory and belief that the statutes of the state established the rule of assessment at the same fixed price per lineal front foot on each side for the whole improvement, and that no change could be made therein by the board of trustees, and that the board refused at [312] *such hearings to hear or consider any objection to the assessment based upon any inquiry into the amount of special benefit accruing to any abutting lot or parcel of land.

It was also averred in the answer and in the cross complaint that all the members of the board of trustees of the town of Irvington were residents of that town and taxpayers therein, and that two members of the board were owners of lots abutting upon said improvement, and assessed therefor at the same rate per lineal front foot as the others, and it was averred that no assessment could legally be levied by such a board of trustees, and the assessment was, for that reason, wholly void.

These defenses contained in the answer, and which were also set up in the cross complaint, were severally demurred to by the complainant Smith, and the demurrers sustained, and upon the refusal of the defendant Hibben to amend, judgment enforcing the lien was entered, which, upon appeal to the supreme court of Indiana, was affirmed. Due process of law, as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, requires that no man shall be judge in his own cause.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

The supreme court of the state of Indiana has held the statute to be constitutional under which this lien was established and judgment entered for its foreclosure. That court has held that under the state Constitution an assessment arbitrarily by the front foot is unconstitutional, but that the statute in question provides only a rule of prima facie assessment by the front foot, and that such assessments are subject to review and alteration by the common council or board of trustees upon the basis of special benefits received from the improvement, and the common council and board of trustees not only have the power, but it is their imperative duty, to adjust an assessment to conform to the actual special benefits accruing to each of the abutting property owners. Adams v. Shelbyville, 154 Ind. 467, 49 L. R. A. 797, 57 N. E. 114; Schaefer v. Werling, 156 Ind. 704, 60 N. E. 149; Martin v. Wills, 157 Ind. 153, 60 N. E. 1021; *Leeds v. De Frees, 157 Ind. 392, 61 N. E. 930; Shank v. Smith, 157 Ind. 401, 55 L. R. A. 564, 61 N. E. 932.

Schaefer v. Werling, 156 Ind. 704, 60 N. E. 149, has been affirmed upon writ of error by this court, 188 U. S. 516, 47 L. ed. 570, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 449, where it was held that the statute in question was not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and the principle was reiterated in that case that the construction placed by the highest court of a state upon a statute providing for paving the streets and distributing the assessment therefor was conclusive upon this court. See also Merchants' & Mfrs.' Nat. Bank v. Pennsylvania, 167 U. S. 461, 42 L. ed. 236, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829.

The amount of benefits resulting from the improvement is a question of fact, and a hearing upon it being assumed, the decision of the board is final. No constitutional question of a Federal nature arises therefrom.

If the board of trustees refuse to hear the owners of property abutting the street improvement, in regard to the subject of benefits, and arbitrarily proceed to levy the assessment solely according to the front foot, the supreme court of Indiana has held that such lot owner was not without remedy, and that he could, by mandamus or injunction, compel a hearing as to the amount of the assessment upon each lot, or prevent the approval of the engineer's report until such hearing had been accorded, and that the lot owner could not waive such a remedy and make the denial of a hearing available as a defense in an action to collect the assessment. Shank v. Smith, 157 Ind. 401, 55 L. R. A. 564, 61 N. E. 932. Under the cases above cited this court follows the decision of the supreme court of Indiana upon this question of remedy. The claim set up on the part of the lot owner, that there can be no due process of law under which an assessment can be made which does not provide for a review of such assessment and a hearing by a court, is not tenable. Assuming the necessity of a hearing before an assessment can be made conclusive, the law may provide for that hearing by the body which levies the assessment, and after such hearing may make the decision of that body conclusive. Although in imposing such *assessments[322] the common council or board of trustees may be acting somewhat in a judicial character, yet the foundation of the right to assess exists in the taxing power, and it is not necessary that in imposing an assessment there shall be a hearing before a court provided by the law, in order to give validity to such assessment. Due process of law is afforded where there is opportunity to be heard before the body which is to make the assessment, and the legislature of a state may provide that such hearing shall be conclusive so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned.

In Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 168, 41 L. ed. 369, 392, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56, 67, it was said that—

“Due process of law is not violated, and the equal protection of the laws is given, when the ordinary course is pursued in such proceedings for the assessment and collection of taxes that has been customarily followed in the state, and where the party who may subsequently be charged in his property has had a hearing, or an opportunity for one provided by the statute.”

And it was also said in that case that whether a review is or is not given upon any of these questions of fact (that is, as to benefits and the amounts of the assessments) was a mere question of legislative discretion, so long as the tribunal created by the state had power to decide them, and the opportunity for a hearing was given by the act, and that it was not constitutionally necessary in such case to give a rehearing or an appeal.

In Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 28 L. ed. 173, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48, where the law provided for the fixing of water rates by a board of supervisors after a hearing, and without any right of review by any court, it was stated (at page 354, L. ed. p. 176, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 51) by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, giving the opinion of the court:

[323] “Like every other tribunal established by the legislature for such a purpose, their duties are judicial in their nature, and they are bound in morals and in law to exercise an honest judgment as to all matters submitted for their official determination. *It is not to be presumed that they will act otherwise than according to this rule.” See Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921.

The sole remaining question arises upon the allegations contained in the answer and cross complaint, that all the members of the board of trustees were residents of the town and taxpayers therein, and that two members of the board were owners of lots abutting upon the improvement, and assessed therefor at the same rate as the others.

The objection to the tribunal constituted by the legislature of Indiana, which the plaintiff in error makes in this particular instance, is that it results in making a person a judge in his own case, and that hence any judgment of a tribunal thus constituted is absolutely void, and may be attacked, as it is attacked in this case, collaterally. It is said that to impose an assessment, which is the same as a judgment under such circumstances, is to take the lot owner's property without due process of law, and violates thereby the Federal Constitution. We think the first objection, that all of the members of the board of trustees were residents of and taxpayers in the town, is wholly unimportant. We have not the slightest doubt of the power of a legislature of a state, unless hampered by some special constitutional provision, to create a tribunal in a city or town, such as the common council or board of trustees, to make an assessment, and that such assessment would be valid, notwithstanding the fact that every member of the board was a taxpayer of the city or the town. It is a matter of legislative discretion as to how such a board shall be constituted, and we hazard nothing in saying that it is quite common throughout the country for the legislatures of the states to create a tribunal for levying assessments for local improvements in a manner precisely like the case in question. It is not at all analogous, even in principle, to a judge of a court acting in a case in which he was personally interested.

To say that no one who was a taxpayer in a city or town could act in imposing an assessment upon property therein is *to say [324] that the legislature is wholly without power, by reason of the Federal Constitution, to constitute a tribunal to make an assessment where such tribunal is composed of taxpayers in the city or town. This we do not believe. It must frequently happen that a board of assessors for a city, to assess all property for general taxation, will be composed of men who themselves own property in the city and assess the same for purposes of such taxation. Can there be any doubt of the validity of the general assessments under such circumstances? And would not the assessment for taxation of the property of the individual members of the board of assessors, made by the board, be valid if authorized by the statute? See Brown v. Massachusetts, 144 U. S. 573, 36 L. ed. 546, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757 (citing 147 Mass. 585, 591, 1 L. R. A. 620, 18 N. E. 587, 150 Mass. 334, 343, 23 N. E. 98.)

Then as to the averment that there was two members of the board who were owners of lots abutting upon the improvement, and were assessed therefor at the same rate as other lot owners. Although it might have been more seemly for those two members, if they recollected the fact of such ownership, to have refused to act in the matter, yet there is nothing to show that their attention was called to the fact, nor does it appear that any objection was made by plaintiff in error or any one else to their acting, nor that the plaintiff in error was ignorant of their interest at the time when the proceedings were commenced. The state court has held that an assessment for improvements under this statute of Indiana is in the nature of a judgment, and the fact that members of the board who levied the assessment owned property, as stated, would not render the judgment void, but at most, voidable, and that it could not be attacked collaterally. The cases of Bradley v. Frankfort, 99 Ind. 417; Jackson v. Smith, 120 Ind. 520, 22 N. E. 431, and Carroll County v. Justice, 133 Ind. 89, 30 N. E. 1085, are referred to.

Whether a judgment obtained in a case like this, where two members of a general board created by statute for the purpose of making it had some interest in some of the [325] property subject to the assessment, was a void or voidable judgment, is a proper question for the state court to decide. A state court has the right to place its own construction upon its own judgments, and where, as in a case like this, it holds that the judgment is not void, and that it cannot be attacked collaterally, we ought to follow that determination. Newport Light Co. v. Newport, 151 U. S. 527, 38 L. ed. 259, 263, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 429.

In Lent v. Tillson, 140 U. S. 316, 35 L. ed. 419, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 825, which was an assessment case, it was stated by Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court (p. 333, L. ed. p. 427, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 832), as follows

"Other objections have been urged by the plaintiffs which we do not deem it necessary to consider. For instance, it is said that the mayor of the city of San Francisco, one of the board of commissioners, was himself the owner of a lot on Dupont street, and, for that reason, was incompetent to act as one of the board of street commissioners. . . . In respect to all these and like objections, it is sufficient to say that they do not necessarily involve any question of a Federal nature, and so far as this court is concerned, are concluded by the decision of the supreme court of California."

The provisions of the 14th Amendment do not cover such an objection as is now under consideration. The general system of procedure for the levying and collection of taxes which is established in this country is, within the meaning of the Constitution, due process of law. Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658. A provision made by the legislature of a state in relation to the manner of levying an assessment for a local improvement is, within this principle, a proceeding for the levying and collection of taxes, and unless it be in violation of some particular provision of the Federal Constitution, it will be upheld in this court. The 14th Amendment, it has been held, legitimately operates to extend to the citizens and residents of the states the same protection against arbitrary state legislation affecting life, liberty, and property as is offered by the 5th Amendment against similar legislation by Congress; but that the Federal courts ought not to interfere when what *is complained of amounts to the enforcement [326] of the laws of a state applicable to all persons in like circumstances and conditions, and that the Federal courts should not interfere unless there is some abuse of law amounting to confiscation of property or a deprivation of personal rights, such as existed in the case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187.

These principles have been reiterated in a series of cases reported in 181 U. S. commencing with French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. at page 324 (45 L. ed. 879, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625) of that volume.

The facts contained in the objection now under discussion do not, in our judgment, constitute any violation of the Federal Constitution, or result in the taking of the property of the plaintiff in error without due process of law, as that term is understood when used in the Constitution of the United States. We see no error in the record in this case which we can review, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Indiana is affirmed.

Mr. Justice White concurred in the result.

freight yard, and to sustain a verdict in his favor, where there was testimony tending to show that in boarding the pilot the stirrup, which had long been defective, gave way, throwing his foot into one of the unfilled spaces between the ties, from which he could not extricate himself in time to prevent injury; that his action was in the proper discharge of his duties; that the only company rule on the subject warned employees not to jump on or off an engine running at a high rate of speed; and that he was without knowledge of the defect in the stirrup or the condition of the track where he was hurt.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of Arkansas in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 C. C. A. 497, 116 Fed. 23.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

[327] *The defendant in error commenced this action against the railroad company, plaintiff in error, in the Pulaski circuit court in the state of Arkansas, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him by reason of the alleged negligence of the company. He alleged in his complaint that on February 6, 1900, while engaged as head brakeman on a freight train of the defendant company, and while in the discharge of his duty as such, in the town of Argenta, near Little Rock, Arkansas, he attempted to jump upon the pilot of the engine of the train of which he was head brakeman, at a time when the engine was proceeding very slowly (about 4 miles an hour) in the freight yards. That in attempting to jump upon the pilot he stepped on an iron stirrup or step on the pilot or "cow-catcher" of the engine, and where, in the performance of his duty, he was accustomed to step, and by reason of its being in a weak and unstable condition it gave way and precipitated him to the ground, where he became entangled in the ties of the railroad track, and the train ran over his left leg, and bruised and mangled the same so that he was compelled to have it amputated near the knee. He alleged that the defendant was negligent in the construction of the step, and was negligent in permitting it to stay in a faulty and infirm condition, and the condition of the step was unknown to the plaintiff; that he might have escaped uninjured but for the negligent construction of the track, the ties of which stood up above the ground, so that he was unable to get his foot out in time to prevent the engine from running over his leg and crushing it.

The defendant is a corporation organized and incorporated under an act of Congress, and on that ground removed the case into the United States district court in Arkansas, and thereafter served its answer to the complaint. It denied all negligence, and alleged that the plaintiff was attempting to step upon the front end of the engine, which was unnecessary and which was careless and improper on his part, and that he was not required in the discharge of his duty, nor was it necessary for him to attempt to so ride, and in attempting to do *so he was vio- [328] lating the rules of the company. It denied that the step on the pilot was in a weak and unstable condition or that it gave way and thereby precipitated the plaintiff to the ground, and denied that the condition of the step had anything to do with the precipitation of the plaintiff to the ground, which resulted in his injury, and it denied that the condition of the step was unknown to the plaintiff.

Upon these issues the case came to trial and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, which, upon appeal to the circuit court of appeals, was affirmed (53 C. C. A. 497, 116 Fed. 23), and the railroad company then sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Edward B. Peirce submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The fact of the accident carries with it no presumption of negligence on the part of the employer, and it is an affirmative fact for the injured employee to establish that the employer has been guilty of negligence.

If the plaintiff was using the step for any other purpose than that for which it was designed, and was injured, he cannot recover, regardless of whether said step was safe or not, or whether the defendant knew, or ought to have known, of the defect or not.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is quite a simple case, although counsel on both sides have exhibited very great industry in presenting in their briefs in the greatest detail the substance of all the evidence that was given upon the trial.

After the evidence was in a motion was made on the part of the defendant company that the jury should be instructed to find a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff. The denial of this motion brings up the question whether there was sufficient evidence upon which to base a recovery, and it is upon that question that the briefs of counsel have been so full. It is wholly unnecessary to follow counsel in their minute details of this evidence. It is sufficient for us to say that it tended to show the following among other facts:

He was the head brakeman of the train, and as such his particular position, when running into freight yards like the one at Argenta, was on the front of the engine, to [329] enable him *to attend to the switches promptly, as they were encountered, and to prevent the danger of running off the track; that the only rule of the company which was promulgated and which he ever saw in regard to the matter of riding on the pilot of the engine was one warning the employees not to jump on or off an engine when it was running at a "high rate of speed." The plaintiff said that he had never received instructions not to ride on the front end of the engine, but on the contrary had often been commanded by conductors to do so; that on the occasion of the accident the engine was moving very slowly, not more than four miles an hour, and that when the plaintiff attempted to board the pilot of the engine, and received the injury complained of, he was discharging his duty in the proper and customary manner of a head brakeman under like circumstances.

The accident occurred about ten o'clock on a dark night, and the plaintiff carried a lantern to enable him to see to properly discharge his duties in regard to switches; the pilots of freight engines are provided with a step or stirrup on which to place the foot, and where it is customary for the head brakeman to stand when coming into the freight yard under the circumstances detailed, and the engine in question had such a step or stirrup. When the plaintiff attempted on this occasion, after having attended to one of the switches, to get on the engine, then moving about 4 miles an hour, he placed his foot on the step mentioned, and it gave way or went down under him, and his foot came to the ground under one of the ties, the space between the ties not being filled in, and he was unable to get it out in time to prevent being run over. This step or stirrup had been in a defective condition for some time, and it was so loose three or four days prior to the accident that a witness and employee of the defendant had at that time warned a fellow brakeman not to step on it because of the condition it was then in. The plaintiff had no knowledge that the step was out of repair or defective before the accident occurred. This freight yard where the accident occurred had *been [330] constructed a few months before and the company had but just commenced to use it in which to park and make up its trains; that the plaintiff, on account of some physical disability keeping him off the road for a short period before the accident, had run into this yard only once or twice before the accident occurred, and was not very familiar with its condition at the time in question. He had never been on track No. 3, where he was hurt, until the evening of the accident, and he had no information concerning the condition of that track prior to being injured. The plaintiff testified:

"When I stepped on the engine, this step was on the pilot about as wide as my hand. I stepped up on it with the hollow of my foot and leaned over to catch hold of the top of the pilot and my foot went down with the step, and I hallooed as soon as it went down and fell, and I couldn't get my foot out and the pilot run over my leg. My leg got in between the ties and I pulled with all my might to get it out, but I seen I couldn't get it out and just give up and let it go. My foot got hung between the ties, between the bottom of the ties, and held it fast. . . . I hallooed as loud as I could to make the engineer hear me, but he didn't see me. He must have felt that the wheel of the engine hit something because he stopped the engine right where the engineer gets up into the engine. The step of the engine stopped right at me. I hallooed as loud as I could.

When I got my foot caught in there the train ran over me and mashed my leg—mashed it all to pieces; broke the bone, mashed my knee cap all to pieces. I suffered just as near death as any man could suffer and not die. It wouldn't have been as hard to die."

Plaintiff testified that he thought that if the track had been filled in his foot would not have been caught and that he could have extricated himself when the stirrup on the pilot gave way. Other evidence was given on the part of plaintiff of the same general nature.

[331] On the other hand, the defendant gave evidence tending to show that although it was customary to surface up the tracks *in depot yards by filling in between the ties, yet, as this was a new yard, it was in the condition in which newly constructed yards are usually left for some time to permit the water to drain off. Evidence was also given tending to show the impropriety of the plaintiff's attempting to get on the engine while it was in motion, and that it was a violation of the rules of the company.

Taking all the evidence we are of opinion that there was enough to demand its submission to the jury, and if by that body found to be true, it was enough upon which to found a verdict for the plaintiff.

The chief ground upon which the demand for a new trial is founded outside of the above rests upon certain portions of the charge of the court to the jury in speaking of the law relating to the responsibility of an employer to his servant to furnish proper machinery and appliances for his employee. In two or three places, in the course of his charge to the jury upon that subject, the court, in speaking of the testimony in regard to the facts occurring at the time of the accident, said that the company owed to its employees the duty of furnishing machinery in a reasonably safe condition and a reasonably safe place for the servant to work in the discharge of his duties, and a failure to do so makes the company liable in damages for any injuries sustained by the servant while in the discharge of his duties, if the servant's own acts of negligence do not contribute to the accident.

The fault found with this observation is that the court should have added that the company did not absolutely guarantee to furnish its employees a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe machinery with which to discharge their duties, but that it fulfilled its obligations if it observed reasonable care to furnish its employees those reasonably safe places to work, etc.

It need not be questioned that the charge of the court, without the limitation proposed, was an erroneous exposition of the law. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612; Union P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 161 U. S. 451, 457, 40 L. ed. 766, 770, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618, and cases cited. A careful reading of the charge, however, shows that upon the particular occasions when these remarks were made the judge was endeavoring to draw the attention of the jury more to the question whether the defendant had in fact furnished machinery in a reasonably safe condition than to the question of its obligation to use due diligence to furnish the same.

An exception was taken to but one of the remarks of the court upon this particular subject, and if the defendant had felt that there was really any danger of any misunderstanding of the rule which should govern the jury, a request to the court to restate the rule, with his attention specially called to the defective portion of the charge, would, without doubt, have received the immediate attention of the court, and obtained a charge upon the subject as requested. We say that, because in looking through this charge it is perfectly plain that the court understood the true rule that it was necessary to show that the company had been negligent in not taking reasonable precautions to furnish proper machinery and appliances in order to become liable for the injury sustained by the employee. The jury were told by the court that, in order to find the defendant liable, it must determine from the evidence whether the step or plate in front of the engine and attached to the pilot, and which plaintiff tried to step on at the time of the accident, was, by reason of the defendant's negligence, insecurely fastened, and that by reason of its being insecurely fastened the plaintiff fell and was injured as alleged.

The court also charged the jury that, unless it was shown by the evidence that the employer or master was guilty of negligence in its failure to provide such a safe place for the servant to perform his duties as, under like conditions, others in similar businesses are in the habit of furnishing, the defendant would not be liable. He further said that it was left to the judgment of the jury to determine from the evidence whether the railroad company was guilty of negligence in allowing at that time and place the track to remain with the *spaces between the cross[333] ties unfilled, and that they were to consider the fact that this yard had but recently been made, and that was a pertinent fact in relation to the question of the negligence of the company.

Again, the court at almost the end of his charge stated that if this plate had been properly fastened when the train left for its destination, and had been inspected at a proper and suitable time by the defendant, and was found to be in perfect condition, and that within a short time before the accident occurred something unknown or unforeseen had caused it to become loose, "Then, gentlemen of the jury, they would not be guilty of negligence, because then they would have exercised due diligence for the purpose of ascertaining whether everything was in perfect order."

And once more the court said:

"Now then, that you are to consider:

"If you find that it has exercised due diligence, such as any ordinary reasonable man would exercise in matters of that kind, then it would not be liable.

"But, on the other hand, if they had not, and it was loose, or if it was loose at such time that by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary diligence they could have discovered it and repaired it, and that was the cause of the accident, they have been guilty of such negligence as makes them liable.

"Of course, so far as the railroad company is concerned, it does not, in any event, become the insurer of its servants' or employees' safety, regardless of its own diligence; all it undertakes to do is to keep the machinery and its right of way and place where they work in good and proper order, and use such diligence as a prudent man and careful man would use. And the company is not liable for any defect of which an employee has knowledge at the time."

These observations were at the very conclusion of the charge.

[334] We think it clearly appears that the right directions were given to the jury in regard to the legal responsibility of the defendant, and that the detached and incidental remarks made *in regard to such liability, where they failed to state the proper limitation of liability, were used under such circumstances as to make it absolutely certain that the jury were not misled thereby.

Many exceptions were taken in regard to the admissibility of evidence during the trial of the cause, and to the refusal of the court to charge as requested by the defendant. We have examined them all and are entirely satisfied that no error was committed by the court in the disposition it made of them. Many of the requests to charge were covered by the charge of the court actually given, and many others were but partially correct, and so mingled with erroneous statements of the law as to warrant the court in rejecting them.

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, must, therefore, be affirmed.

v.

WILL HOLLOWAY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 334-340.)

Negligence—instructions—proximate cause.

1. A charge upon the subject of the knowledge by a fireman of the absence of brakes on the engine on which he had ridden 50 or 60 miles is not erroneous, where it amounts solely to a direction to the jury that the man was bound to use his eyes, and if, by their use, he could see the defect, he was bound thereby, even though he had not observed it; but that he was not bound to make a careful examination of every part of an engine upon which he was fireman, in order to charge the railway company with negligence, or exonerate himself from the charge of contributory negligence.
2. The court need not charge the jury that an employer is bound to exercise reasonable care to furnish its employees reasonably safe machinery where the uncontradicted facts show that it had not furnished such a machine, and there was no evidence that it had exercised ordinary or reasonable care to do so, but, on the contrary, there was unexplained and uncontradicted evidence to show that it had not exercised such care.
3. The absence of a brake from an engine, the presence of which would have prevented a collision with a horse on the track, is the proximate cause of the resulting derailment.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

Holloway, the plaintiff below, brought this action in a state court of Arkansas, against the railroad company, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged by him to have been sustained through the negligence of the company while he was in its employ and acting as fireman on one of its engines. The action was removed into the United States district court in Arkansas, on account of the company being incorporated under an act of Congress.

Upon the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and upon writ of error from the circuit court of appeals the judgment entered upon the verdict was affirmed (52 C. C. A. 260, 114 Fed. 458) and the company has brought the case here for review.

The amended complaint alleged that the plaintiff was, on October 27, 1900, in the employ of the defendant company as a fireman, and that on the night of October 31, 1900, while he was so engaged, the engineer of the engine on which he was employed received orders from his superior officer, directing him to back up his engine (consisting of an engine and tank or tender) from Brinkley east to Hulbert, a distance of about 60 miles, and that upon receiving the orders the engineer and the plaintiff requested that they be permitted to reverse or turn the engine so that the headlight would be in front [336] and *the tender or tank in the rear, and they would thereby be enabled to run the same with greater safety; but this request was refused, and they were directed as stated; that, in obedience to the orders, they left Brinkley about 11 o'clock at night, and continued to run the engine backward until it reached a trestle about 13 miles east of Brinkley, when they ran upon and collided with a horse upon the said trestle, without fault upon their part, and the switch engine was derailed, and plaintiff caught between the tank or tender and the engine, and seriously and permanently injured.

One ground upon which negligence of the defendant was founded was, as alleged in the complaint, the bad condition of the brakes on the engine, which it was alleged were not in a condition to work; that the same were out of repair, and that there were no brake shoes on the brakes of the engine, and as a consequence the engine brakes could not be worked, and therefore when the engineer discovered the horse on the track, and applied the air brakes, those on the wheels of the tank or tender were successfully applied, while, on account of the absence of shoe brakes on the engine, the brakes could not be worked, and the effect of applying the air brakes was to stop the tank or tender without having any effect on the engine, and the engine was therefore forced with all its weight and momentum against the tank or tender, thereby breaking the cast-iron connection between the engine and tank or tender, and bringing the ends of the engine and tank close together; and as the plaintiff was attempting to escape by going out between the ends of the engine and tank, he was caught between the same and thereby injured; that he had only been on the engine for a few hours and knew nothing of the dangerous condition of the engine brakes.

These various allegations of the ignorance of the plaintiff, and of orders given to back the engine, were denied by the defendant. The company averred that the engine had no brakes whatever on it, and that the brakes on the tender or tank were in good working condition, and it denied that it was *in any-[337] wise guilty of negligence which caused the injury. It also averred that if the plaintiff sustained any injury it was due to his own carelessness or negligence, and was the result of a risk assumed by him for which the defendant was not liable.

The chief defense was founded on the allegation that the plaintiff assumed whatever risk there was in his occupation of fireman on the engine in question, and that he in fact knew perfectly well that the engine had no brakes, and that he could not but have observed that fact on a ride of 50 or 60 miles, which he had taken on the engine prior to going out on it the evening in question.

The plaintiff, however, swore distinctly that he did not know of the absence of brakes on the engine. By the consent of the parties, the jury viewed the locomotive, and the court gave the jury instructions in relation to that matter, and told them that in examining the engine—

"You will go inside and try to put yourselves only in the same place that the fireman would naturally occupy, and then, occupying that place, you are to determine whether the wheels of the engine on which the brakes would be can be seen from there without looking for them, while a man is employed for several hours doing work on the engine as a fireman,—that is, whether he could easily see them by just keeping his eyes open."

And the court also stated:

"A man cannot shut his eyes and say he don't want to see anything which a reasonable man could not help but see if he keeps his eyes open.

"Now, if for that reason—that is, if the fact that there were not any brake shoes on that engine was obvious to any reasonably prudent man who runs on it as a fireman for several hours, as the evidence shows that plaintiff did for six hours, from Hulbert to

Brinkley, before he went back again before the accident happened—that is perfectly obvious to a man who is fireman and traveling [338] for six hours (without hunting for it), *then the court will tell you that he had knowledge of, and ought to have known it, and he is chargeable with it as if he had known it.’

Taking the whole charge together upon the subject of the knowledge by the plaintiff of the absence of brakes on the engine, we think there was no error in the judge’s charge. It amounted simply to a direction to the jury that the man was bound to use his eyes, and if by their use he could see that the machinery was defective, he was bound by that fact, even though in truth he had not observed it; but that he was not bound to make a careful examination of every particle of an engine upon which he was fireman in order to charge the defendant with negligence or to exonerate himself from the charge of contributory negligence.

Upon the subject of the duty of the defendant to furnish safe machinery, the court said:

“By the laws of the country the defendant was bound to furnish its employees working tools which were reasonably safe, and a place to work in which was reasonably safe. If it does that, then it has discharged its duty, and in case of accident to one of its employees it is not liable for the injuries sustained by him.”

Freed from the surrounding facts, and viewed simply as an abstract proposition, it might be maintained that the court erred in its charge that the company was bound to furnish its employees working tools which were reasonably safe and a place to work in which was reasonably safe, and when it has done that it has discharged its duty. The charge left out the condition that an employer is only bound to take ordinary and reasonable care, as applied to the circumstances under which the liability arises, to furnish reasonably safe appliances and machinery. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 218, 25 L. ed. 612, 615; Union P. R. Co. v. O’Brien, 161 U. S. 451, 40 L. ed. 766, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618. But the fact that the company had failed to supply such a machine because of the absence of brakes had [339] been fully proved by uncontradicted *evidence, and, indeed, was conceded by the company. The circumstances, unexplained, were such as to make the omission to furnish a brake for the engine prima facie negligence on the part of the company. It was unexplained by any evidence, and remained as a fact proving negligence. There was no occasion, therefore, to call attention to the fact that the company was only bound to exercise reasonable care to supply a reasonably safe engine, because the uncontradicted facts showed it had not furnished such an one, and there was no evidence that it had exercised ordinary or reasonable care to furnish it, but on the contrary there was evidence to show that it had not, and it was unexplained and uncontradicted. The failure of the court to call the attention of the jury to this limitation of liability was unimportant because of the evidence already given, which showed the defendant had not complied with the limitation.

It is insisted, however, on the part of the defendant, that the court erred in not holding that the absence of brakes on the engine was not the proximate cause of the injury; that the presence of the horse on the trestle was the proximate cause of derailing the tender and engine, and that the company was not guilty of any negligence by reason of which the horse came upon the trestle.

We think this claim is unfounded, and that the proximate cause of the injury within the meaning of the law was the absence of the brakes on the engine. At any rate, there was evidence which made it a question for the jury to say whether the accident would have happened if there had been brakes on the engine in good order and fit for use.

It may be assumed that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant by reason of which the horse came upon the trestle, and that it was not, therefore, responsible for any damage of which the horse was the sole and proximate cause. We think one proximate cause of the accident was the absence of the engine brakes. The purpose of a brake is to stop the engine more promptly than can be done without it, and *if there [340] had been a brake on the engine it would, if used, have probably prevented the accident. At any rate, there was evidence to that effect. The absence of a brake which, if present, would have prevented the accident, was, therefore, a proximate cause thereof. If an obstacle on the track which necessitates the using of the brake is to be regarded as the sole proximate cause of an accident which occurs only because there was no brake on the engine, the result would be that the company would never be liable, no matter what its negligence in not providing effective brakes, so long as its own negligence did not cause the presence of the obstacle on the track. This cannot be true.

The obstacle is one of the things which caused the necessity to use the brake, and it is the neglect of the company in not furnishing the brake which constitutes an immediate and proximate cause of the injury.

The finding of the jury under the instructions of the judge must be regarded as finding that the accident would not have occurred if there had been a brake on the engine.

These are the principal objections to the judgment under review. The other matters appearing in the record we have examined, but do not find that they are of sufficient importance to require any further notice. The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit is, therefore, affirmed.

ment of the District Court for the District of New Jersey, entered upon an award of the jury in condemnation proceedings. Affirmed.

See same case below, 57 L. R. A. 932, 50 C. C. A. 597, 112 Fed. 893.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The plaintiff in error has sued out this writ for the purpose of reviewing a judgment of the United States circuit court of appeals for the third circuit, which affirmed a judgment of the district court of New Jersey, awarding damages to plaintiff in error for the taking of certain property of his on the Delaware river, near Fort Mott, in that state. The award of the jury was, in the opinion of the plaintiff in error, entirely inadequate as just compensation to him as the owner of the land for its taking by the government.

Pursuant to an act of Congress, approved August 18, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 315, chap. 797, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2518), making appropriations for fortifications and *other works of defense, and, also, under [342] other acts of Congress and an enabling act of the state of New Jersey, the United States district attorney for that state commenced these condemnation proceedings. At the time of their commencement the plaintiff in error was the owner of three separate and independent, although adjoining, farms or tracts of land, known respectively as the "Dunham," the "Gibbons" and the "White" farms. It is the Gibbons farm which is taken by these proceedings.

Under the New Jersey practice in condemnation matters, the United States district court for the district of New Jersey duly appointed three commissioners to appraise the value of the land in question, which they did, and made their report July 16, 1900, in which they reported that they had appraised the value of 41.75 acres of land to be taken at the sum of $500 per acre, or a total sum of $20,875, and they fixed the damages sustained by reason of the taking of that land for the purposes stated, to the remaining tracts of land, at the sum of $12,953. An appeal from the award of the commissioners was duly taken in behalf of the United States to the United States court for the district of New Jersey, and in accordance with the practice an issue was framed to be tried before the court and jury as a proceeding de novo. The issue as presented for trial was "Whether the sum of $500 per acre—in all, the sum of $20,875—is a just and equitable estimate or appraisal of the value of the said 41.75 acres of land required to be taken for the purposes aforesaid, and whether the damages sustained by reason of the taking of the said 41.75 acres, by the United Eminent domain—evidence of value—offers to purchase—record on appeal—damages to adjacent property—instructions.

1. The testimony of an owner of real property of offers to purchase the same for hotel, residential, or amusement purposes, or for a ferry, or a railroad terminal, or to lease the property for hotel purposes, is inadmissible on the issue in condemnation proceedings as to the value of such property.
2. Statements by the court in his charge which refer to evidence which does not appear in a bill of exceptions not purporting to contain all the evidence, when not excepted to nor corrected by counsel, will be taken as supplementing the evidence in the record.
3. Just compensation to the owner of three absolutely separate and independent, though adjoining, farms, one of which only was taken in condemnation proceedings, does not demand an award of the damage to the two remaining farms, arising from the proposed use of the condemned property for military purposes.
4. The jury on a trial de novo upon an appeal from an award of commissioners in condemnation proceedings are properly instructed that they must be satisfied as to the value and damage by the testimony produced before them, without reference to any testimony produced before the commissioners, and that they must not be influenced by the commissioners' report.

States for the purpose aforesaid, to the remainder of the tracts of land from which the above-mentioned tract is taken, and its issues, and which the parties in interest will sustain by reason of the premises, amount to the sum of $12,953, and if not, what is a just and equitable estimate or appraisal of the value of same, and an assessment of damages to be paid by the said the United States of America, for such lands or materials and damages aforesaid?"

[343] *It was also ordered that a jury should be struck, and a view of the premises and property described in the report of the commissioners and in the petition should be had by the jury. This was done and a trial subsequently had. Testimony was taken upon the trial, and by consent of counsel it was agreed that the jury might bring in a verdict stating such a lump sum for the value of the lands and the damages to the adjacent property as they thought was fairly proven from the testimony produced before them.

The jury found and assessed the value of the lands and the damages sustained at the sum of $12,000, to be paid the plaintiff in error by the United States. Judgment having been duly entered upon the award of the jury, an appeal was taken to the circuit court of appeals, where the judgment was affirmed (57 L. R. A. 932, 50 C. C. A. 597, 112 Fed. 893), and the case is now before us on writ of error sued out by the owner of the land.

Mr. David J. Pancoast argued the case and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Every inquisition of damages is made with the use in view to which the land is to be devoted. One use may bring with it important compensations in benefits, while another may be specially injurious far beyond the value of the land taken, and a new use may entirely reverse these conditions.

To entitle an owner to recover for damages to the whole tract when a part of his lands have been taken, there must have been

The rule for measuring damages in the state of New Jersey is that, when the whole property is taken, it is its market value, and, when a part only is taken, it is the difference in the value before and after such taking, to be ascertained by the use to which such untaken part can be put.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions to be reviewed by this court arise upon exception appearing in the record taken upon the decisions of the court in relation to the admissibility of evidence, and also to the charge of the court as to the proper items to be considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict.

191 U. S.

The errors assigned and upon which the argument was had in the circuit court of appeals were twelve in number. They are in substance the same here. The first seven refer to the rejection of evidence in regard to offers to purchase the lands from the plaintiff in error. It was held by the trial court, in response to the proposal to give such evidence, that the plaintiff in error could not testify to different offers he had received to purchase the property for hotel, residential, or amusement purposes, or for a ferry, or a railroad terminal, or to lease the property for hotel purposes.

Upon principle, we think the trial court was right in rejecting the evidence. It is, at most, a species of indirect evidence of the opinion of the person making such offer as to the value of the land. He may have so slight a knowledge on the subject as to render his opinion of no value, and inadmissible for that reason. He may have wanted the land for some particular purpose disconnected from its value. Pure speculation may have induced it, a willingness to take chances that some new use of the land might, in the end, prove profitable. There is no opportunity to cross-examine the person making the offer, to show these various facts. Again, it is of a nature entirely too uncertain, shadowy, and speculative to form any solid *foundation for determining the value[349] of the land which is sought to be taken in condemnation proceedings. If the offer were admissible, not only is it almost impossible to prove (if it exist) the lack of good faith in the person making the offer, but the circumstances of the parties at the time the offer was made as bearing upon the value of such offer may be very difficult, if not almost impossible, to show. To be of the slightest value as evidence in any court, an offer must, of course, be an honest offer, made by an individual capable of forming a fair and intelligent judgment, really desirous of purchasing, entirely able to do so, and to give the amount of money mentioned in the offer, for otherwise the offer would be but a vain thing. Whether the owner himself, while declining the offer, really believed in the good faith of the party making it, and in his ability and desire to pay the amount offered, if such offer should be accepted, or whether the offer was regarded as a mere idle remark, not intended for acceptance, would also be material upon the question of the bona fides of the refusal. (Oral and not binding offers are so easily made and refused in a mere passing conversation, and under circumstances involving no responsibility on either side, as to cast no light upon the question of value. It is frequently very difficult to show precisely the situation under which these offers were made. In our judgment they do not tend to show value, and they are unsatisfactory, easy of fabrication, and even dangerous in their character as evidence upon this subject. Especially is this the case when the offers are proved only by the party to whom they are alleged to have been made, and not by the party making them. There is no chance to cross-examine as to the circumstances of the party making the offer in regard to good faith, etc. Evidence of this character is entirely different from evidence as to the price offered and accepted or rejected for articles which have a known and ready sale in the market. The price at the stock exchange of shares of stock in corporations which are there offered for sale or dealt in is some evidence of the value of such shares.

[350] So *evidence of prices current among dealers in those commodities which are the subject of frequent sales by them would also be proper to show value. This evidence is unlike that of offers to purchase real estate, and affords no ground for the admissibility of the latter.

A reference to the authorities shows them to be almost unanimous against receiving evidence of this kind. Counsel have cited many cases on this subject and they are contained in the margin.† Most of them are clearly against the admissibility of the evidence, while some, which at first sight might be regarded as exceptional, will be found upon closer examination to recognize the general rule as already stated.

The next four assignments of error relate to the proper items of damage to be included in the award.

The owner offered to prove the probable use the government would make of the land for military purposes for which it was taken; also, that the use of the land for such military purposes would damage and depreciate the remaining and adjoining land; also, that if the land to be taken was used by the government for military purposes it would endanger the adjoining land of the owner for a long distance and make the removal of his buildings necessary. These offers were rejected, and the court held that the jury should not take into account prospective damages to the remaining and adjoining land of the owner, arising from the future use of the land sought to be *taken[351] from him for military purposes, although at the same time the court charged, if the evidence showed that by reason of the severance of the farms those which remained were made so small that it would be unprofitable to work them, whatever damage resulted therefrom should be given the owner.

The question in this case arises in a somewhat peculiar way. Under the procedure provided for in the statute of New Jersey upon appeal to the court from the award made by the commissioners, there is to be a new trial of the question as to the amount of damages to which the land owner shall be entitled, and that trial is to be had before a jury under the direction of the judge. For this purpose an issue is to be prepared by the judge in the presence of counsel for trial before the jury. Pursuant to that practice the court did present to the jury an issue for it to decide, which is set forth in the foregoing statement of facts. Counsel for the owner, therefore, contend that, under that issue, the court should have received all evidence offered by the land owner tending to show the damages sustained by him not only by the taking of the land in question, but also damages to the remaining tracts of land by reason of the use which the government would probably make of the land taken.

We are of opinion that the court was not bound to receive evidence upon any subject which it held to be not a proper item to make up the award to the owner. Evidence of some damage to the remaining farms was permitted, as already seen, which might arise by reason of those farms being made so small that they might not be profitably worked, but what particular items of damage were proper to be considered in relation to the remaining tracts were questions primarily for the trial judge, subject to review in due course of procedure.

The important question is as to the admissibility of evidence of damages to the remaining lands of the owner which would probably flow from any particular and probable use by the government of the land to be taken. It is said by the plaintiff in error that just compensation consists not only in an award of the value of the lands which [352]are taken, but also of any *damage that may result to the portion of the tract which remains, on account of such taking and on account of the use to which the land taken may, or probably will, be put, and he cites many cases to show the correctness of the rule which he asserts.

Its correctness may be conceded, but what we have to decide is whether the facts in this case bring it within the rule itself. We must see, therefore, what those facts are in order to intelligently determine the applicability of the rule asserted by the plaintiff in error.

It appears that long before the commencement of these proceedings there was a government reservation at this point on the Delaware river, upon which Fort Mott had been erected. This reservation had a frontage on that river, and ran back quite a number of feet, in some places nearly two thousand. Permanent fortifications had already been erected, and placements for heavy ordnance already built on this reservation, together with magazines and other appurtenances for the firing of large guns. The particular tract to be taken, namely, all of the Gibbons farm of 41.75 acres, lies on parts of three sides of the government reservation, and a portion of it fronts on the Delaware river, the same as the reservation itself. It was purchased in 1891 for $6,000. The Dunham farm, of 80 acres, was purchased in 1880 for $5,800, by the wife of, and subsequently conveyed by her to, the plaintiff in error; the White farm, also of 80 acres, was purchased in 1899, a little over a month before the commencement of these proceedings, for $5,200. These three tracts of adjoining land, one of which only was taken, thus appear to have come to the present owner by three separate titles at three distinct times, running over a period of about twenty years. The evidence returned in the bill of exceptions, which does not purport to contain all the evidence given on the trial, does not show very clearly the exact condition of these various tracts at the time of their purchase by the plaintiff in error, but the judge, in his charge to the jury, evidently referred to evi-

[353]dence on this subject *which does not appear in the bill, and was not corrected by counsel, and no exception was taken to the statement. We may, therefore, properly regard his references to the testimony actually given, but part of which does not appear, as correct recitals of the same. The judge stated that the Dunham farm, which adjoins the one taken, has 80 acres in it and 600 feet front on the river. The farm had on it a dwelling house and barns and such buildings as ordinarily and, perhaps, necessarily go with a farm of that size and character in that neighborhood. The land that was purchased in 1891 (the farm to be taken) then had a dwelling house, a barn, a carriage house, and such outbuildings as ordinarily go with a farm of that size and character. Then the White farm consisted of 80 acres, and had a farm house on it and buildings but no water front, and one had to go through a lane of some kind to get to it. The testimony was, as stated in the judge's charge, that these farms, including the White farm up to 1899, when it was purchased by the plaintiff in error, were always worked separately, each having its separate dwelling house and outbuildings. It must be assumed that the statements of the court were correct statements of the testimony. If not, the bill of exceptions should have shown it, and some question made at the time in regard to the erroneous character of the charge upon the facts. Error must appear in the record, and cannot be presumed.

The map contained in the record shows a highway between these tracts. From all the evidence which can be gathered from the record it plainly appears to us that these tracts of land were absolutely separate and independent farms, having no necessary relation with each other, and the farming on each had been conducted separately, and each farm had its own house and outbuildings. It is these facts which form the foundation of the charge of the court to the jury.

We are, therefore, not only permitted but bound to regard the evidence in the record as supplemented by the statement of the evidence by the court.

Upon the facts which we have detailed, we think the plaintiff *in error was not entitled [354] to recover damages to the land not taken because of the probable use to which the government would put the land it proposed to take. If the remaining land had been part of the same tract which the government seeks to condemn, then the damage to the remaining portion of the tract taken, arising from the probable use thereof by the government, would be a proper subject of award in these condemnation proceedings. But the government takes the whole of one tract. If the evidence were such as to leave it a matter of some doubt whether the land owned by the plaintiff in error were one tract or separated into three separate and distinct tracts, it would be proper to leave that question to the jury, with the instruction that if they found that it was one tract, then damages might be awarded, and refused if they were separate and independent tracts. Upon this subject it was well stated by Judge Gray, delivering the opinion of the circuit court of appeals, as follows:

"Depreciation in the value of the residue of such a tract may properly be considered as allowable damages, in adjusting the compensation to be given to the owner for the land taken. It is often difficult, when part of a tract is taken, to determine what is a distinct and independent tract; but the character of the holding, and the distinction between the residue of a tract whose integrity is destroyed by the taking, and what are merely other parcels or holdings of the same owner, must be kept in mind in the practical application of the requirement to render just compensation for property taken for public uses. How it is applied must largely depend upon the facts of the particular case, and the sound discretion of the court. All the testimony in this case tends to show the separateness of this tract, which was the subject of the condemnation proceedings. It had never been farmed or used in connection with either of the other farms owned by the plaintiff in error. It was in no way reasonably or substantially necessary to the enjoyment of the other two tracts. Separated from it by a public road, the White farm, so called, had only been purchased by plain-[355]tiff *in error ten days before the proceedings for condemnation were begun. The authorities cited by the defendant in error fully support their contention in this respect. In Currie v. Waverly & N. Y. Bay R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 392, 20 Atl. 56, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, for the proposition that where a part of the tract is taken for condemnation, damages to the remaining land shall be given, the court also says: 'It is an established rule in law, in proceedings for condemnation of land, that the just compensation which the land owner is entitled to receive for his lands, and damages thereto, must be limited to the tract, a portion of which is actually taken. The propriety of this rule is quite apparent. It is solely by virtue of his ownership of the tract invaded that the owner is entitled to incidental damages. His ownership of other lands is without legal significance.' It is enough to say that, in our opinion, the two other farms or tracts of land owned by plaintiff in error constituted such separate and independent parcels, as regards the land in question, that they cannot properly be spoken of as the residue of a tract of land from which the land in question was taken."

If A own a single house in a block in a city and the government proposes to take it, is it liable to the owner of the house adjoining for a depreciation in its value by reason of the taking of the house of A for the purposes proposed? In other words, would the government be liable to the owner of land not taken for damages which were incidental because of the use intended by the government of the property it took? In such case no property of the owner of the other land is taken, and although very great damage might be inflicted upon him by the use of the property taken, has he a constitutional right of recompense? It would be within the discretion of Congress to provide that this damage should be paid to the owner of the land not taken, yet still, in proceedings to condemn a property for public use on payment of "just compensation," under the Constitution, we cannot think (in the absence of Congressional action to that effect) that the government would be liable for consequential damages sustained by a party, no portion of *whose property was taken. Al-[356] though the present is not exactly such a case, yet the illustration serves to somewhat bring out the principle under review.

If again, the government seek to take the property of A, consisting of a single house in a city, and he has also acquired, through a separate title and at a different time, houses adjoining, would the government be liable to A for the damage sustained by that other property on account of the use the government proposes to make of the property taken? Or again, if A purchase a block of vacant lots in a city from one source and at one time and erect a row of buildings thereon, and one building the government seeks to take, would the government be liable for the damages sustained by the other houses by reason of the uses to which it would put the building taken? These are questions involving different facts which may possibly show the various difficulties inhering in the subject under some circumstances (see Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 368, 41 N. E. 489, and Wellington v. Boston & M. R. Co. 164 Mass. 380, 41 N. E. 652); but in the case before us those difficulties do not, in our judgment, exist. There are here separate and distinct farms conducted under the circumstances detailed, and we cannot see that the owner of those separate farms not taken established any right of payment for damages to them arising from the use which the government intended to make of the land it took.

Although denying the right to recover certain alleged damages to the land remaining, the court was not illiberal in the rules it adopted for ascertaining the compensation due for the taking of the land. It permitted the jury to consider not only the purposes to which the land taken had been put, but also, as bearing upon its value, the jury was directed to consider evidence as to the adaptability of the land for other than merely agricultural purposes; that while no merely speculative value was to be placed on the land, this possible adaptability was to be considered, and if, in the judgment of the jury, it was probable that the improvements which had been spoken of in the *testimony[357] would, within some reasonable time, be made, that was an element which might enter into their calculation in forming their estimate of the value of the land.

Therefore the jury was permitted to take into consideration the future possible building of a railroad in the neighborhood which would pass within a mile or so of Fort Mott, although no steps had yet been taken to build it; still, as there had been some talk of building it, and the railroad might thereafter be built, the jury were instructed that if they thought from the evidence it would be built within a reasonable time, and that if built it would enhance the value of the property, they might take that fact into consideration as giving the then present actual value beyond that of an ordinary farm.

The same instructions were given in relation to a trolley road which it was supposed might be built to run near this land.

The jury was also permitted to consider the adaptability of the land for a hotel or cottage sites, and in addition, as already stated, the court charged that if the evidence showed that by reason of the severance of these farms they were made so small that it would be unprofitable to work them, the jury ought to give the damages arising therefrom.

The last assignment of error arose from the charge of the judge that the jury must be satisfied as to the value and damage by the testimony that was produced before it, without reference to any testimony that was produced before the commissioners, or influenced by the commissioners' report. This instruction we think was clearly correct. The case was tried de novo upon the appeal before the court and a jury, and the only testimony to be considered was that which was received on that trial, supplemented by the knowledge obtained by the jury from a personal view of the premises.

Upon a consideration of the whole record, we think, there was no error committed upon the trial of the case before the jury, and the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the third circuit, affirming the judgment of the District Court for the district of New Jersey, is, therefore, affirmed.

[358] *CITY OF OWENSBORO, Appt.,
v.
OWENSBORO WATERWORKS COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 358-372.)

Municipal power to regulate water rates—contract exemption.

1. The power to regulate the rates at which water shall be furnished to consumers in a municipality, whether furnished by private persons or by the municipality itself, was included in the authority conferred by Ky. act of June 14, 1893, § 3290, on a city of the third class, to provide the city and its inhabitants with water service by contract or by works of its own, and to make regulations for the management thereof, and to fix and regulate the prices to consumers.

2. A municipality is not precluded from exercising the power to fix and regulate water rates, conferred upon it as a city of the third class by Ky. act of June 14, 1893, § 3290, by the provisions of a prior municipal ordinance granting the right to construct waterworks, which gave the grantee "power and authority to make and enforce, as a part of the condition upon which it will supply water to its consumers, all needful rules and regulations not inconsistent with the law, or provisions of this ordinance."

Argued November 4, 5, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky to review a decree perpetually enjoining a municipality from regulating water rates. Reversed and remanded.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

This is a bill in equity to enjoin the city of Owensboro, Kentucky, from regulating the rates of the appellee, the Owensboro Waterworks Company.

Lawson Reno, police judge of the city, was made a party. The circuit court granted a temporary injunction. Before final hearing, a motion was made before Circuit Judge Lurton to dissolve the injunction, the motion was denied on the ground of the seriousness of the questions involved, and the propriety of following the previous ruling. On final hearing, the injunction was made perpetual against the city, and the bill dismissed as to Lawson Reno. The city then took an appeal to circuit court of appeals. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that the jurisdiction of the circuit court having been invoked *on a constitutional question, the ap-[359] peal should have been taken directly to this court. 53 C. C. A. 146, 115 Fed. 318. The city then brought the case here from the circuit court.

The city asserts the right to regulate the rates of the appellee under a statute of the state. The construction of the statute is contested by the appellee. The appellee urges, besides, that the statute so interpreted violates its contract with the city, and that the rates as fixed deprive it (the appellee) of its property without due process of law. These contentions make the issues between the parties. The bill is voluminous. The allegations with which we are concerned are the following: The appellant was created a city by the general assembly of Kentucky in 1866. Its charter was amended in 1882, and it continued under this charter until June, 1893, when it was made a city of the third class under the general laws of the state. These laws provided that "the repeal of any law by the provisions of this law [the charter] shall not in anywise be so construed as to affect any right or liability acquired or accrued thereunder by or on the part of the city, or any persons or body corporate. This law shall not in any manner affect any right, lien, or liability accrued, established, or subsisting under and by virtue of previous charters or amendments thereto, or ordinances passed thereunder; but such right, lien, or liability shall be enforced, and such action or proceeding shall be carried on in all respects as if this law [defendant city's present charter] had not taken effect; nor shall this law be in anywise so construed as to affect the right or liability acquired or accrued under previous charters or amendments thereto, or ordinances passed thereunder on the part of the city or any persons or body corporate." [Ky. Stat. 1899, § 3258.]

The Owensboro Water Company was incorporated in 1876, and its general business was to construct and operate a waterworks plant for the purpose of supplying the city and its inhabitants with water, and it constructed and operated such works under the privilege and authority of an ordinance of the city, passed September 10, 1889. The [360] ordinance had the usual *provision for the use of the streets, and made the duration of the grant identical with the duration of the company. It was provided that the ordinance should be binding upon the city "as a contract in the event" of its written acceptance within ten days after its passage, and "be the measure of the rights and liabilities of the said city and of the water company."

Section 9 of the ordinance was as follows:

"Sec. 9. The said company shall have the power and authority to make and enforce, as part of the condition upon which it will supply water to its consumers, all needful rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the law or provisions of this ordinance."

In June, 1889, the appellee began negotiations with the Owensboro Water Company for the purchase of its franchise and plant, and of all of its contracts with the city, but did not and would not consummate said purchase until the city agreed to grant it (appellee) a franchise and license to maintain a system of waterworks in the city for a period of twenty-five years, and issue and grant to it in its own right all of the rights and privileges which had theretofore been granted to the water company by the ordinance and contracts of September 10, 1878. On the 3d of June, 1889, the city passed an ordinance approving such purchase, and granted a franchise and license to the appellee to maintain and operate a waterworks plant for supplying the city and its inhabitants with water, and accepted the appellee as the successor of the water company to the contracts between the latter and the city. The ordinance was expressed to be in consideration "of the purchase, by the Owensboro Waterworks Company of Owensboro, Kentucky, of the waterworks of the Owensboro Water Company."

On the 10th of June, 1889, relying upon the ordinance of the 3d, the appellee consummated the purchase from the water company of its works, franchises, and contracts, and received them from that company, and it "has ever since then under the orders and directions" of the city, maintained and extended its system, on account of which it has expended large *sums of money, and its [361] plant is now reasonably worth not less than $250,000, and could not be constructed for less than that sum.

On the 19th of March, 1900, the city passed an ordinance providing "that hereafter every person, firm, company, and corporation, engaged in the business of furnishing water to consumers thereof in the city of Owensboro, shall furnish the same to consumers thereof for domestic and manufacturing purposes and uses, and for all other purposes and uses, at rates and prices not exceeding the rates and prices herein named fixed, which rates and prices are deemed reasonable and just; that is to say, water shall be furnished to all mills, laundries, saloons, distilleries, breweries, livery stables, ice factories, and manufacturing establishments, hotels, street railway companies, and all factories of every kind at the following named rates."

Then followed a statement of the rates fixed, graduated according to the amount of water consumed or kind or purpose of use. And it was provided (§ 8), "that if any person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in the business of furnishing water to consumers thereof in said city of Owensboro shall demand, charge, exact, or receive, directly or indirectly, of or from any consumer or consumers of water in said city, as consideration or compensation for water furnished or supplied to such consumer, any money, property, or other thing of value over and above or in excess of the rates and prices for water herein named and prescribed, or shall fail or refuse for ten days, without reasonable excuse, to supply water as prescribed and required in and by section seven (7) of this ordinance; or shall fail or refuse to keep the accounts or the books required to be kept at Owensboro, or make the reports in writing to the common council, as required by section sixth (6th) of this ordinance, such person, firm, company, or corporation so offending shall be fined, upon conviction, in a sum not less than ten, and not exceeding fifty, dollars for each offense."

[362] *The ordinance in full is inserted in the margin.†

†An Ordinance to Fix and Regulate Rates, Prices, and Charges for Water Furnished Consumers in the City of Owensboro, and for Other Purposes.

Be it ordained by the common council of the city of Owensboro :

Sec. 1. That hereafter every person, firm, company, and corporation engaged in the business of furnishing water to consumers thereof in the city of Owensboro, shall furnish the same to such consumers thereof for domestic and manufacturing purposes and uses, and for all other purposes and uses, at rates and prices not exceeding the rates and prices herein named and fixed, which rates and prices are deemed reasonable and just; that is to say, water shall be furnished to all mills, laundries, saloons, distilleries, breweries, livery stables, ice factories, hotels, street railway companies, and all factories and manufacturing establishments of every kind, at the following-named rates, subject to the exceptions contained in section two (2) of this ordinance, to wit :

(1) In all cases where the amount of water consumed averages 2,000 gallons per day, or less, estimated by the month, $.10 per thousand gallons; (2) where the daily consumption of water averages 2,000 gallons, or more, and less than 4,000 gallons, estimated by the month, $.09 per thousand gallons; (3) where the daily consumption of water averages 4,000 gallons, or more, and less than 10,000 gallons, estimated by the month, $.08 per thousand gallons; (4) where the daily consumption of water averages 10,000 gallons, or more, and less than 15,000 gallons, estimated by the month, $.07 per thousand gallons; (5) where the daily consumption of water averages 15,000 gallons, or more, and less than 25,000 gallons, estimated by the month, $.05 per thousand gallons; (6) where the daily consumption of water averages 25,000 gallons, or more, and less than 40,000 gallons, estimated by the month, $.04 per thousand gallons; (7) where the daily consumption of water averages 40,000 gallons, or more, estimated by the month, $.03½ per thousand gallons.

That for the purpose of ascertaining and estimating accurately the quantity of water consumed by consumers in the classification of this section, and the compensation to be paid therefor, it is hereby made the duty of the persons, firms, companies, and corporations, and they shall, on request made in writing, and within thirty days after such request is made, place a water meter, in good condition and repair, in connection with the pipe or main leading into and supplying water to such consumers, and the

It is alleged that the enforcement of the ordinance will cause appellee irreparable injury, and in what manner that will be *done[363] is detailed, and that, appellee "could not, under the most prudent management, earn any per cent upon its investment, but would be compelled to operate its plant at an actual loss."

*For the reasons alleged the ordinance of[361] March, 19 violates the Constitution of the state of Kentucky, and the 5th and 14th Amendments of the Constitution of the United *States. It is also alleged, with much[365] amplification, that the passage of the ordinance was "ex parte and partisan," without said meter shall be kept in good repair by the person, firms, company, and corporation furnishing or supplying the water to such consumers, and the said meters shall be examined and read monthly, for the purpose of ascertaining its condition and the quantity of water consumed.

Provided, that the minimum annual rate to be paid by all consumers of water described in the classifications thereof in this section, per annum, shall be twenty-four (24) dollars; and in no case shall the consumer of water who uses or consumes, annually, 240,000 gallons of water, or less, be charged or pay more or less than twenty-four (24) dollars per annum.

Sec. 2. That water furnished by said persons, firms, companies, and corporations to consumers thereof for domestic purposes and uses where no meter has been put in or attached for ascertaining the quantity of water used, shall be furnished at rates and charges not exceeding or above the following-named rates and charges, per year, to wit :

(1) For each wash stand, wherein warm and cold water, or either, is used, $2; (2) for each kitchen sink, wherein warm and cold water, or either, is used, $2; (3) for each bath tub, wherein warm and cold water, or either, is used, $2; (4) for each water closet and urinal, $2; for sprinkling premises, lawn, pavement, and street in front of or adjacent to the premises, per annum, $2.50 for the first 200 square yards or less, $.01 for each additional square yard; (6) for private dwelling per annum where only one tap or faucet is used, containing four rooms or less, excluding hallways, garrets, bath rooms, water closets, $2, and for each additional room, $.50; (7) for each cow, $1, for each horse, $1; and for each carriage, buggy, and spring wagon, $1; (8) for filling cisterns, $.20 each thousand gallons.

Sub. Sec. 2. And for furnishing water for offices, banks, stores, and other places than residences (above specified in this section), the rates and charges therefor shall be at rates not exceeding or above the following rates and charges, per year, to wit :

For each wash stand, wherein warm and cold water, or either, is used, $3; (2) for each water closet and urinal, $3; (3) for hydrant, $3; (4) for barber shops, for first chair, $3, for each additional chair, $1; (5) for blacksmiths, for first forge, $2, and for each additional forge, $1; (6) for plasterers, ¼ of 1 cent per square yard; (7) for bricklayers, $.06 per one thousand brick, sprinkling and laying.

Provided, that any of the consumers embraced in the classification of this section may, in lieu [366]deliberation or investigation or knowledge, and, besides, the *city had no power to pass the ordinance, and that the latter violates the contract existing between appellee and the city. It is also alleged that financial injury will result to appellee from the enforcement of the ordinance in regard to meters (§ 2), and from the prohibition to collect rates in advance, "except by voluntary consent of the consumer." (§ 3.) Prosecutions are threatened under the ordinance, which will result, it is alleged, in irreparable injury to appellee, and an injunction is hence prayed against the city.

A demurrer to the bill was overruled. An answer was then filed, which denied the allegations of the bill, and justified the action of the city.

Mr. George W. Jolly argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant:

The power of the legislature to delegate to the municipal legislature a sufficient part of the legislative power of the state to enact the ordinance and all other needful local laws cannot be doubted.

of the above rates, require the person, firm, company, or corporation furnishing the water to the consumer to attach to the pipe leading into the premises of the consumer a water meter, and it shall be the duty of the person, firm, company, or corporation furnishing the water to attach the said meter within thirty days after said request is made therefor in writing, and thereafter the said consumer shall be charged, and shall pay for the water furnished at the minimum rate of $12 per annum, and for all water consumed in excess of 120,000 gallons per annum there shall be paid $.10 for each thousand gallons; but such meters shall not be attached except by the written request of the consumer.

And, provided further, that before meters are attached to or connected with the pipes or mains leading into the premises of any consumer described in the classification of this section, by the person, firm, company, or corporation supplying the water, consent of such consumer shall be first obtained, and if objection shall be made by the consumer, the mayor of the city, upon complaint by the person, firm, company, or corporation furnishing the water, shall summon the consumer to appear before him, and shall hear and determine the matter, and decide whether the meter shall be attached, and his decision shall be final.

If said persons, firms, companies, or corporations furnishing water shall attach a meter in any case to the pipe leading into any consumer's premises, without his consent, or against his objection, and the water annually consumed shall not be as much as 120 gallons, the consumer shall pay for the water actually consumed at the rate of $.10 per thousand gallons, and no more.

Sec. 3. That water rates may be collected by said persons, firms, companies, and corporations from all consumers falling within the provisions of §§ 1 and 2 of this ordinance who have water meters attached, monthly, quarterly, or semi-annually, at the election of said persons, firms, companies, or corporations furnishing the water, but water rates shall not be collected in advance except by voluntary consent of the consumer.

Water may be shut off from any consumer for nonpayment of water rates, or other sufficient reason, only after ten days' written notice served upon said consumer or his wife, in his absence from home, or in case of absence from premises of both husband and wife, then the said notice shall be delivered by depositing same in the Owensboro postoffice, addressed to said water consumer.

Sec. 4. That if any person, firm, company, or corporation shall be or become a consumer of water, and shall not be included in the classification made and contained in the 2d section of this ordinance, the quantity of water used or consumed by such consumer shall be ascertained by meter, and compensation made therefor at the rates and charges specified in the 1st section of this ordinance.

Sec. 5. That all persons, firms, companies, or corporations furnishing water to consumers in the city of Owensboro, that shall have mains, pipes, and conduits in the streets, alleys, and public ways of the city, shall hereinafter, during the months of April, May, June, July, August, September, October, November in each year, cause all water mains of said persons, firms, companies, and corporations to be washed and cleaned, and for this purpose shall cause all fire hydrants to be open to their full capacity and water discharged from each for at least five minutes once in every two weeks; and during

Mr. Robert W. Bingham argued the cause, and, with Messrs. W. W. Davies and Sweeney, Ellis, & Sweeney, filed a brief for appellee:

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 339, note.

The presumption is that the legislature does not intend to change or modify the law beyond what it explicitly declares, either in express terms or by unmistakable implications, for it is not to be supposed that the legislature will overturn an established principle of law without expressing such intention with irresistible clearness.

Sec. 7. That it shall be the duty of any person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in the business of furnishing water to consumers thereof, in the city of Owensboro, through pipes, mains, or conduits laid in the streets, alleys, and ways of said city, to furnish water to all persons who may make application therefor in writing, and within ten days after the date fixed in such written application, and who desire the same furnished in houses or places situated on

Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co. 177 U. S. 559, 44 L. ed. 887, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 736.

By the act of the general assembly of Kentucky, approved June 14, 1893, the appellant was made a city of the third class, and was given, as a city of that class, the following powers expressed in § 3290: "The common council of each of said cities shall, within the limitations of the Constitution of the state and this act, have power by ordinance; [367]. . . 5th, to provide *the city and the inhabitants thereof with water, light, power, heat, and telephone service by contract, or by works of its own, located either within or beyond the boundaries of the city. To make regulations for the management thereof, and to fix and regulate the prices to private consumers and customers."

Under this section the city passed the ordinance which prescribes the rates and regulations complained of. The circuit court decided that the city was not given the power to pass the ordinance, and considered it unnecessary to pass on the other issues. The court said:

"If the city of Owensboro had no lawful power or authority to pass the ordinance at all, then the enforcement of it would clearly be a taking from the complainant of its right to certain property. First, without compensation; second, without due process of law; third, without giving to it the equal protection of the law.

"This makes it necessary to inquire whether the city had the statutory power and authority to pass the ordinance complained of. It does not seem to be needful to inquire whether the state Constitution gives the general assembly power to delegate authority in the premises to the city. The initial proposition is, Has the legislature done so in fact, whether it had the power or not? This must depend upon the proper interpretation and construction of § 3290 of the Kentucky statutes, . . ."

Interpreting the section, the court held that the word "thereof" in the last sentence of the section had for its antecedent the words "works of its own." Substituting these words for the word "thereof," the sentence would read, and the city's power would be, "to make regulations for the management of its own works, and to fix and regulate the prices to consumers and customers." But another ambiguity appears, viz., Of what is the city to fix and regulate the prices? Certainly of something, and it would seem from the context, the same thing, of which it was to regulate the management. But this leads to an absurdity, and we must find a purpose [368] (antecedent) to which *both powers can refer. The city might, indeed, make regulations for the management of its works, but it could not fix and regulate the prices of them to consumers and customers. Besides, we cannot conceive that an explicit grant of power was necessary to enable the city to manage its own works. The power to construct would have implied the power to manage and operate. It must not be overlooked that the section was intended to apply to not only to the appellant city but to all cities of the third class, and confer power not only to provide water, but other services, and it might have seemed necessary by the legislature, or at any rate prudent, to reserve to the cities the power over the management of works constructed by private persons, and as prudent to reserve a power to fix and regulate the prices to consumers of the services afforded. It is certainly not difficult to conceive the necessity of the exercise of those powers, and if attempted to be exercised without a reservation, the cities might be met (and there are examples of this) with the contention that the power had been bartered away and was precluded by the obligation of a contract. The construction urged by appellee must, therefore, be rejected. There is a more natural one. The purpose of § 3290 was to provide the inhabitants of cities of the third class with the services mentioned,—water, light, power, heat, and telephone. They could be provided by the cities directly or they could be provided by private persons; but whatever way provided, the power was given to regulate the management and fix the rates of the services, and this was but the endowment of a common governmental power.

It is, however, contended that the ordinance is in violation of the contracts between the city and appellee, constituted by the resolutions and ordinance of the 3d of June, 1889. The argument is that the city had entered into contracts with the Owensboro Water Company, the predecessor of appellee, to which contracts and their obligations and rights, it is contended, the appellee succeeded by assignment from the water company, with the consent and approval of the city, as expressed *in the resolutions and [369] ordinance of June 3, 1889. To determine their legal effect, however, it will be necessary to consider the law which authorized them.

At the time of the passage of the ordinance granting the Owensboro Water Company the right to construct waterworks the city existed and was exercising its powers under the charter of 1878, and the provision in that for supplying water to the inhabitants of the city was as follows: "To make, establish, and regulate wells, cisterns, reservoirs, and pumps, and to provide for the furnishing of the city and the inhabitants thereof with water and gas."

The same provision was carried into the charter of 1882, and constituted the authority of the city when the ordinance and resolutions of June, 1889, were passed. It is contended that this provision gave the city no power to fix the rates. And counsel say: "In such case, and in the absence of an express contract, the individual or corporation furnishing water for domestic purposes may charge whatever seems right and reasonable."

But counsel go farther. They deny the right of the city to fix rates, and yet assert its power to enter into an irrevocable contract with the water company giving it such power, that is, giving it power to fix rates free from any regulation by the city, not only under any authority the city then possessed, but under any authority the city might be given by the legislature.

In this contention there are several elements, but we pass their consideration, and determine what contract, if any, the city entered into with the water company. Of course, it is implied in the grant to the company that it might charge some rates to consumers, but the question is, Were those rates exempt from regulation by the city under any power it then had or might be given? An affirmative answer is contended for by the appellee under §§ 9, 10, and 14 of the granting ordinance. Section 9 is the pivotal section. The others are complementary. By it the company was given "power and authority to make and enforce as a part of the condition (italics ours) *upon which it will supply water to its consumers, all needful rules and regulations (italics ours), not inconsistent with the law or provisions of this ordinance." The section is concerned with the rules between the company and consumers alone. The company may enforce all needful rules and regulations as part of the condition upon which it will supply water. What is the other part of the condition? It must be the payment of rates, but to that part of the condition the power to make regulations does not apply. It would ignore the distinctions made by the section, and give, besides, the words "rules and regulations" too large a meaning to make them include the power of fixing rates to consumers. They have adequate and useful signification without that. There were many things in the supply of water to consumers and in the orderly and prudent conduct of the business of the company which might need rules and regulations.

And even so construed, the power conferred is not without limitation. The rules and regulations must not be inconsistent "with the law," and this means not only as the law was when the ordinance was passed, but as the law might become. Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 812, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 832; Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636; 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191. In the latter cases a grant of power to the railroad company was to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations which the directors might deem needful and proper touching all matters whatsoever which might pertain to the concern of the company. The company was also given the power "from time to time to fix, regulate, and receive the toll and charges by them to be received for transportation of persons or property on their railroad." From this grant of power it was claimed that the company had "the right of managing its own affairs and regulating its charges for the transportation of persons and property, free of all legislative control." Mr. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, replied: "This power of regulation is a power of government, continuing in its nature, and if it can be bargained away at all it can only be by words of positive grant, or something *which is in law equivalent. If [371] there is reasonable doubt, it must be resolved in favor of the existence of the power."

This doctrine has been affirmed numbers of times since. Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport, 180 U. S. 587, 45 L. ed. 679, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Rogers Park Water Co. v. Fergus, 180 U. S. 624, 45 L. ed. 702, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490; Joplin v. Southwest Missouri Light Co. 191 U. S. 150, ante, 127, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43. And the same doctrine prevails in Kentucky. Winchester & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Croxton, 98 Ky. 73S, 33 L. R. A. 177, 34 S. W. 518.

From these views it follows that if the city had no power under the charters of 1836 and 1882 to fix rates, and we only assume this, not decide it, such power was conferred by § 3290 of the act of June 14, 1893, and the city is not precluded from the exercise of that power by §§ 9, 10, and 14 of the original ordinance granting the Owensboro Water Company the right to construct waterworks, nor by the ordinance of June 3, 1889, approving the transfer of the rights and contracts of that company to the Owensboro Water Works Company, the appellee herein. Nor is the city, by said ordinance, precluded from regulating the business of the appellee in the manner provided in the ordinance of March 19, 1900, which is the subject of the present controversy. It is true that it is contended that § 3 of the ordinance forbids the appellee from collecting rates in advance from all consumers. But the city does not contend for that construction. It claims only that the provision in regard to the collection of rates in advance applies only to consumers using meters, and even as to those consumers appellee can make reasonable regulations to secure the payment of rates. The ordinance is not absolutely clear, and we may resolve its ambiguities in accordance with the concession of the city. It may be presumed that there was no intention to enact unreasonable and oppressive regulations.

Two other contentions remain to be considered,—one made by appellant, and the other made by the appellee. It is difficult to assign a place or purpose in the discussion of the issues to that made by the appellant. The contention is that the Owensboro Water Company had no power to transfer its prop-
[372]erty *and rights and franchises to the appellee. To what consequence is the contention directed? Surely the city wants an object for its regulation. The appellee is in possession of the waterworks, and is supplying the inhabitants of the city with water. It is that service which the city desires to regulate, and it is to "every person, firm, company, and corporation" engaged in that service the ordinance of March 21, 1900, is addressed. No other person, firm, or corporation than the appellee is so engaged in Owensboro, or has been so engaged for some years. We do not think that the legality of the ordinance can be questioned or measured by either the company or the city by the defects or perfections of the title of the company to its franchises or property. It may be, however, that it is not intended to press the contention so far, but to confine it to the denial of the exemption claimed by appellee as successor of the Owensboro Water Company. But, as we hold that the Owensboro Water Company had no such exemption, the contention becomes unimportant.

The other contention made by appellee is that the rates fixed by the city are unreasonable. Upon this contention we shall not pass. It depends upon many questions of fact and of values to which the circuit court gave no attention, and on which it expressed no judgment. It is better for a trial court to determine such questions in the first instance. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Tompkins, 176 U. S. 167, 179, 44 L. ed. 417, 422, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336.

Decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

DAVIS PROVISION COMPANY.

Full faith and credit—action on foreign judgment.

Full faith and credit are not denied an Illinois judgment by N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1780, which, as construed by the New York courts, precludes the maintenance of an action on such judgment by one foreign corporation against another, because it is not upon a cause of action which arose within the state.

Argued November 6, 9, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of New York to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court of New York County dismissing on demurrer a suit brought by one foreign corporation against another upon a foreign judgment, which had been affirmed by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court for the First Judicial Department. Affirmed.

See same case below, 169 N. Y. 506, 62 N. E. 587.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Wilson Bridges argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

It was the express intention of the Constitution to give the most ubiquitous effect to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the various states.

42 Federalist; Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 484, 3 L. ed. 413.

There is only one exception, apparently, and that is that the states are not compelled to give force and effect, within their jurisdiction, to judgments obtained in another state on the ground of penalty.

The Antelope, 10 Wheat. 66, 6 L. ed. 268.

Corporations have been expressly held to be entitled to invoke the protection of the clause against the inviolability of contract, and have also been held to be included in the term "persons" under the 14th Amendment.

Corporations are to be deemed and considered as persons when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in such statute.

Beaston v. Farmers' Bank, 12 Pet. 134, 9 L. ed. 1029.

The commercial clause of the Constitution applies to corporations.

Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 182, 19 L. ed. 361.

There can be no rational interpretation of the act of Congress, unless it declares a judgment conclusive when a court of the particular state where it was rendered would pronounce the same decision.

Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 485, 3 L. ed. 413; Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 97 U. S. 331, 24 L. ed. 959.

There may be some rights under the Constitution of the United States which a corporation might claim under peculiar circumstances in a state other than that in which it was chartered.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 597, 10 L. ed. 312.

It has been held by this court that a statute of the state of Mississippi, which provided that no action should be maintained in that state on a foreign judgment against a resident in any case where the cause of action would have been barred by any act of limitation of that state (Mississippi) if such suit had been brought therein, was unconstitutional.

Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475.

The decision in the case at bar also violates the commercial clause of the Constitution.

Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 734, 28 L. ed. 1139, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739.

Mr. Frank E. Smith argued the cause, and, with Mr. Thomas F. Conway, filed a brief for defendant in error:

The clause of the Constitution in question relates only to the effect of the judgment as evidence.

Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. ed. 239, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370; Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 36 L. ed. 1123, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224.

The present plaintiff, being an Illinois corporation, is not within the jurisdiction of New York, and so is not entitled to the equal protection of its laws.

Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 43 L. ed. 432, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165.

International comity no doubt accords to foreign corporations the privilege of suing in the local courts.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274.

The state of New York has recognized this principle, and in express terms opened its courts to foreign corporations, and placed them on the same footing as those of its own creation as regards claims against its own residents, or affecting property within its jurisdiction. This would seem to be all that courtesy requires of it. It has also declared its public policy to be that its courts shall not be vexed with the controversies of strangers originating without its limits.

Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. 112 N. Y. 315, 2 L. R. A. 636, 19 N. E. 625; Hocs v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 173 N. Y. 435, 66 N. E. 119.

So, also, the courts of New York decline jurisdiction of transitory actions between nonresidents based upon personal wrongs done without the state, even when the parties are both natural persons, and, of course, citizens of another state.

Collard v. Beach, 81 App. Div. 582, 81 N. Y. Supp. 619.

There can be no question of the right of a state absolutely to exclude from its territory foreign corporations, excepting, perhaps, those engaged in interstate commerce and those used as instrumentalities of Federal government.

Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 44 L. ed. 657, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518.

The right to sue is a franchise conferred upon a corporation by its charter and the law of its creation. How far the law of the state which created it and gave it that right shall be recognized and enforced in another state is for that other state to determine.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274.

Courts being the creation of the state in which they exist, what power they shall possess is, of course, for that state to say.

Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, sub nom. Bowman v. Lewis, 25 L. ed. 989.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the court of appeals of New York. The parties are both Illinois corporations, and the plaintiff in error brought suit in the New York supreme court upon an Illinois judgment. By the New York Code of Civil Procedure, § 1780, it is provided that "an action against a foreign corporation may be maintained by another foreign corporation, or by a nonresident, in one of the following cases only:

. . . 3. Where the cause of action arose within the state, etc." The other cases are immaterial. The complaint does not allege that the original cause of action arose within the state, if that would make any difference in the result. The complaint was dismissed by the Supreme Court on a demurrer setting up the above section, and the judgment was affirmed by the appellate division and by the court of appeals. 169 N. Y. 506, 62 N. E. 587. It was argued below that, under article [374] IV., § 1, of the Constitution *of the United States, the state could not thus exclude foreign corporations from suing upon judgments obtained in another state, because to do so was to deny full faith and credit to those judgments. The decision to the contrary is the error assigned.

The state court decides that the cause of action did not arise within the state in the sense of the words of the Code, and, of course, we follow its construction, subject to the inquiry whether the statute as construed is consistent with the Constitution of the United States. See Northern C. R. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U. S. 258, 267, 47 L. ed. 167, 172, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62. The court also decides that the language quoted goes to the jurisdiction of the court.

We are of opinion that the section of the Code as construed is not unconstitutional. The precise point has not been decided by this court, but it has been laid down in cases which raise greater difficulties than the present, that this provision of the Constitution establishes a rule of evidence rather than of jurisdiction. Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 291, 32 L. ed. 239, 243, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370; Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 36, 47 L. ed. 366, 371, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237. The Constitution does not require the state of New York to give jurisdiction to the supreme court against its will. If the plaintiff can find a court into which it has a right to come, then the effect of the judgment is fixed by the Constitution and the act in pursuance of it which Congress has passed. Rev. Stat. § 905 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 677). But the Constitution does not require the state to provide such a court. See Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 30, sub nom. Bowman v. Lewis, 25 L. ed. 989, 992. If the state does provide a court to which its own citizens may resort in a certain class of cases, it may be that citizens of other states of the Union also would have a right to resort to it in cases of the same class. Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 256, 43 L. ed. 432, 438, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165. But that right, even when the suit was upon a judgment of another state, would not rest on the 1st section of article IV., on which alone the plaintiff relies or can rely, but would depend on the 2d section, entitling the citizens of each state to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. The plaintiff is not a citizen within this section (Paul v. Virginia, *8 [375] Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 45, 44 L. ed. 657, 664, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518), and did not set it up. The general power of a state to restrict the right of a foreign corporation to sue in its courts is assumed in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 589-591, 10 L. ed. 274, 308, 309. As to discrimination against nonresidents, see Chemung Canal Bank v. Lowery, 93 U. S. 72, 23 L. ed. 806.

The plaintiff lays great stress upon Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475. In that case suit was brought in Mississippi on a Kentucky judgment against a citizen of Mississippi upon a promissory note made in Mississippi, and payable in New Orleans. A suit upon the note would have been barred by the Mississippi statute of limitations when the suit in Kentucky was begun, and the defendant set up a statute of Mississippi providing that no action should be maintained upon a judgment rendered in such circumstances without the state against a resident of the state. It was held that the statute was void, and that, as the judgment was valid in Kentucky, it could not be treated as invalid in Mississippi. It will be observed that this was a suit by a citizen. There was no suggestion that the statute went to the jurisdiction of the court. Obviously it did not. Indeed, the suit was brought in the United States circuit court. The statute made no discrimination in the right to come into court, according to the character of the plaintiff or of the cause of action, but attempted to create a defense against a plaintiff assumed to have a right to come into court and to invoke the jurisdiction. But when the plaintiff was in court, and exhibited his judgment, it was too late for the state to interfere. In the case at bar the plaintiff had no right to come into the New York supreme court.

What, if any, limits there may be to state restrictions upon the jurisdiction of state courts, when such restrictions do not encounter article IV., § 2, of the Constitution, it is unnecessary to discuss. But we think it too plain for further argument that the New York restriction upon suits by foreign corporations against foreign corporations is not affected by either § 1 or § 2 of article IV. It will be time enough to consider the [376] suggestion that the law is an interference with interstate commerce, within Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 734, 28 L. ed. 1137, 1139, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739, when the record presents it. The question is one of degree, and it is obvious that the supposed interference is very remote. See Dia-

DAVIS PROVISION COMPANY, Smith M.
Weed, Frank E. Smith, et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 376-378.)

Direct appeal from circuit court.

1. A plaintiff cannot maintain a direct appeal from the Federal circuit court to the Supreme Court under the act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, § 5 (26 Stat. at L. 827, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549), because the jurisdiction of the lower court was in issue, where that jurisdiction was sustained and a decree rendered in favor of defendants on the merits.
2. The mere fact that the defeated party in a suit in the Federal circuit court set up the repugnancy of a state law to the Federal Constitution does not authorize him to maintain a direct appeal to the Supreme Court under the act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, § 5 (26 Stat. at L. 827, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549), where his contention on that point was sustained.

Argued November 9, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a decree dismissing a bill in a suit on a foreign judgment. Dismissed.

See same case below, 112 Fed. 574.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Wilson Bridges argued the cause, and filed a brief for appellant.

Mr. Frank E. Smith argued the cause, and with Mr. Thomas F. Conway, filed a brief for appellees.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court dismissing the plaintiff's bill. The bill is founded on the matters stated in the preceding case. It alleges that the Davis Provision Company recovered a judgment against the plaintiff, in New York, about a year and a half after the judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the Davis Provision Company in Illinois. It shows the effort of Illinois judgment, and the action of the New York courts which we have reviewed. It alleges that the two judgments arose out of the same transaction, and that, by reason of the New York decision, the plaintiff is unable to set off the judgment against that obtained in New York by the defendant. It sets up the unconstitutionality of the New York statute, alleges the insolvency of the Davis Provision Company, and prays for a set-off of judgments. A demurrer to the bill was overruled (105 Fed. 536), but on final hearing the bill was dismissed on the ground that the judgment in favor of the Davis Provision Company had been assigned to the defendant Weed, for value, and under such circumstances that it was not subject to the set-off claimed. The plaintiff appealed to this court.

It was admitted by the appellant, at the argument, that the plaintiff would fail on the merits if the preceding case should be decided as it has been. But we are precluded from an inquiry into the merits, or even into the jurisdiction, taken by the circuit court under Rev. Stat. §§ 1977, 1979 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1259, 1262), until the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the appeal is established. Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 382, 28 L. ed. 462, 463, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510.

Under the act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, § 5 (26 Stat. at L. 827, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549), this must be maintained either as a case in which the jurisdiction of the circuit court is in issue, or as a case in which the "law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States." With regard to the former ground, the circuit court sustained the jurisdiction, and the case is disposed of by United States v. Jahn, 155 U. S. 109, 114, 115, 39 L. ed. 87, 90, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, 41. "If the question of jurisdiction is in issue, and the jurisdiction sustained, and then judgment or decree is rendered in favor of the defendant on the merits, the plaintiff, who has maintained the jurisdiction, must appeal to the circuit court of appeals, where, if this question of jurisdiction arises, the circuit court of appeals may certify it." With regard to the latter ground, the decision of the circuit court again was in favor of the plaintiff, *and [378] it has nothing of which to complain. "As a general rule the court will not allow a party to rely on anything as cause for reversing a judgment, which was for his advantage." Cited from Mr. Justice Curtis' dissent in the Dred Scott Case, 19 How. 393, 566, 15 L. ed. 691, 767, in Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 382, 28 L. ed. 462, 463, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510. This remark, to be sure, is not strictly in point, as the plaintiff would not ask to have the judgment reversed on the ground that this New York law was constitutional. But it, with the quotation from United States v. Jahn, helps to indicate a principle to be applied to the construction of the words "in any case in which the Constitution or law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States." Those words are general in form, but they do not mean that whenever a party makes a case of that sort he may appeal directly to this court whenever the decision is against him, no matter on what grounds, although his contention about the state law is sustained. If a party comes into the circuit court alleging that a state law is unconstitutional, and the circuit court decides for him on that point, the mere fact that there was such a question in the case does not authorize him to appeal to this court on grounds that otherwise would not support an appeal. See Lampasas v. Bell, 180 U. S. 276, 45 L. ed. 527, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 368. The present case illustrates the principle. The argument for the appellant is devoted not to any constitutional or jurisdictional point, but to an attempt to upset the decision of the circuit court upon the question, mainly of fact, as to the good faith, etc., of Weed in taking the assignment of the judgment. The provisions of § 5 of the act of 1891 were not intended to be made an instrument for such attempts.

NOTE.—On direct review by the Supreme Court of the United States of circuit or district court judgments or decrees—see note to Gwin v. United States, 46 L. ed. U. S. 741.

Appeal dismissed.

Taxation of railroad—contract exemption—interference with interstate commerce.

1. No contract exemption from taxation was made by Mich. act May 27, 1893, § 3, in favor of a railroad company coming within its provision that the rate of taxation fixed by that act or any other law of the state should not apply to any railway company thereafter building and operating a line of railroad within the state north of the 44th parallel of latitude until the same had been operated for ten years, unless the gross earnings should equal a specified sum per mile.
2. No unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce is made by Mich. act of June

This is an appeal from a decree of the United States circuit court, dismissing the plaintiff's bill on demurrer. The bill seeks to enjoin the auditor general of the state of Michigan from collecting a tax, on the ground that the law imposing the tax is contrary to the Constitution of the United States as impairing the obligation of contracts, and interfering with interstate commerce.

The alleged contract is contained in a law of May 27, 1893, § 3, which, after levying a specific tax on railroads, provided "that the rate of taxation fixed by this act or any other law of this state shall not apply to any railway company hereafter building and operating a line of railroad within this state north of parallel forty-four of latitude until the same has been operated for the full period of ten years, unless the gross earnings shall equal $4,000 per mile, except," etc. Afterwards, on October 23, 1893, the Menominee & Northern Railroad Company was incorporated under the laws of the state, and forthwith conveyed all its property, rights, and franchises to the plaintiff, a Wisconsin corporation, which is assumed to stand in the shoes of the Michigan company. The plaintiff thereupon constructed the road. This road is north of parallel forty-four, its gross earnings never have been equal to $4,000 per mile, and it would be entitled to the exemptions just stated if the law of 1893 still were in force. But on June 4, 1897, the state passed a law amending the act of 1893, and levying a "specific tax upon the property and business of [every] railroad corporation operated within the state," and enacted that "when the railroad lies partly within and partly without this state, prima facie, the gross income of said company from such road for the purposes of taxation shall be on the actual earnings of the road in Michigan, computed by adding to the income derived from the business transacted by said company entirely within this state, such proportion of the income of said company arising from the "interstate business as the [385] length of the road over which said interstate business is carried in this state bears to the entire length of the road over which said interstate business is carried." This is the law which the plaintiff says is unconstitutional for the reasons above set forth.

The demurrer to the bill was sustained on the ground that the act of 1893 made no valid contract of exemption from taxation, and that the act of 1897, repealing the exemption granted in 1893, was a constitutional law.

The plaintiff makes a supplemental alternative argument that the later statute should not be construed to repeal the act of 1893 with regard to roads in the plaintiff's position. If that were so the plaintiff would have no standing in this court. But the repeal is plain from the express words at the end of the section quoted from the act of 1897, repealing all acts or parts of acts contravening the provisions of that section, from the fact that it is an amendment of the section quoted from the act of 1893, and from the case of Manistee & N. E. R. Co. v. Commissioner of Railroads, 118 Mich. 349, 350, 76 N. W. 683. See also Welch v. Cook, 97 U. S. 541, 24 L. ed. 1112. On that question we follow the state court. Northern C. R. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U. S. 258, 267, 47 L. ed. 167, 172, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62.

The first and main question, then, is whether the act of 1893 purported to make an irrevocable contract with such railroad as might thereafter comply with its terms. The question is pretty well answered by a series of decisions in this court. A distinction between an exemption from taxation contained in a special charter, and general encouragement to all persons to engage in a certain class of enterprise, is pointed out in East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 13 Wall. 373, 20 L. ed. 611, S. C. 19 Mich. 259, 2 Am. Rep. 82. In earlier and later cases it was mentioned that there was no counter-obligation, service, or detriment incurred that properly could be regarded as a consideration for the supposed contract. Christ Church v. Philadelphia County, 24 How. 300, 16 L. ed. 602; Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 527, 22 L. ed. 805; *Grand Lodge, F. [386] & A. M. v. New Orleans, 166 U. S. 143, 41 L. ed. 951, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 523. See Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 459, 21 L. ed. 204, 206. But whatever the ground, thus far attempts like the present to make a contract out of the clauses in a scheme of taxation which happen to benefit certain parties have failed. See further, Welch v. Cook, 97 U. S. 541, 24 L. ed. 1112, and Manistee & N. E. R. Co. v. Commissioner of Railroads, 118 Mich. 349, 76 N. W. 683, in which the state court deals with this very act.

It may be that a state, by sufficient words, might bind itself without consideration, as a private individual may bind himself by recognizance or by affixing a seal. A state might abolish the requirement of consideration altogether for simple contracts by private persons, and, it may be that it equally might dispense with the requirement for itself. But the presence or absence of consideration is an aid to construction in doubtful cases,—a circumstance to take into account in determining whether the state has purported to bind itself irrevocably or merely has used words of prophecy, encouragement, or bounty, holding out a hope but not amounting to a covenant.

In the case at bar, of course the building and operating of the railroad was a sufficient detriment or change of position to constitute a consideration if the other elements were present. But the other elements are that the promise and the detriment are the conventional inducements each for the other. No matter what the actual motive may have been, by the express or implied terms of the supposed contract, the promise and the consideration must purport to be the motive each for the other, in whole or at least in part. It is not enough that the promise induces the detriment or that the detriment induces the promise, if the other half is wanting. If we are to deal with this proviso in a general tax law as we should deal with an alleged simple contract, while, no doubt, in some cases between private persons the above distinctions have not been kept very sharply in mind (Martin v. Meles, 179 Mass. 114, 117, 60 N. E. 397), it is clear that we should require an adequate expression *of an actual intent on the part of the [387] state to set change of position against promise before we hold that it has parted with a great attribute of sovereignty beyond the right of change. See Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 668, 29 L. ed. 770, 771, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625. Looking at the case in this way, then, we find no such adequate expression. No doubt the state expected to encourage railroad building, and the railroad builders expected the encouragement; but the two things are not set against each other in terms of bargain. See Covington v. Kentucky, 173 U. S. 231, 238, 239, 43 L. ed. 679, 682, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383.

But this is a somewhat narrow and technical mode of discussion for the decision of an alleged constitutional right. The broad ground in a case like this is that, in view of the subject-matter, the legislature is not making promises, but framing a scheme of public revenue and public improvement. In announcing its policy, and providing for carrying it out, it may open a chance for benefits to those who comply with its conditions, but it does not address them, and therefor, it makes no promise to them. It simply indicates a course of conduct to be pursued until circumstances or its views of policy change. It would be quite intolerable if parties not expressly addressed were to be allowed to set up a contract on the strength of their interest in, and action on the faith of, a statute, merely because their interest was obvious and their action likely, on the face of the law. What we have said is enough to show that in our opinion the plaintiff never had a contract, and therefore makes it unnecessary to consider the usual power to alter, amend, or repeal charters, etc., contained in the Constitution of Michigan (Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 21 L. ed. 204; Covington v. Kentucky, 173 U. S. 231, 43 L. ed. 679, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 636, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530), or a similar power in the general railroad law of 1873, of which the above acts of 1893 and 1897 were amendments through intervening amending acts.

We need say but a word in answer to the suggestion that the tax is an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce. In form the tax is a tax on "the property and [388] business *of such railroad corporation operated within the state," computed upon certain percentages of gross income. The prima facie measure of the plaintiff's gross income is substantially that which was approved in Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 228, 35 L. ed. 994, 995, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163. See also Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 163 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 49, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1054.

Decree affirmed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana to review a decree perpetually enjoining the collection of certain taxes. Reversed and remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill.

Statement by Mr. Justice Day:

The Comptoir Nationale d'Escompte de Paris, a corporation organized under the laws of the Republic of France, filed its bill in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, seeking to enjoin collection of certain taxes, and to cancel the assessment thereof. These taxes were undertaken to be collected under an assessment upon office furniture, $1,000; money in possession, $20,000; "money loaned on interest, all credits, and all bills receivable for money loaned on interest or advanced for goods sold, $175,000." There is no contest as to the taxes assessed upon the furniture or money in possession, but it is sought to enjoin the collection of the tax assessed upon the $175,000, which for the year 1891 is the sum of $4,550.

Complainant avers that it has no money loaned on interest, credits or bills receivable for money loaned on interest or advanced, or for goods sold within the state of Louisiana, subject to taxation; that its credits in said state are debts due to it, of which it has no legal evidence of indebtedness within the state, and that these debts have no legal situs in Louisiana, and can only be taxed at the domicile of the Comptoir in Paris. That the taxes assessed were in violation of the Constitution and jurisprudence of Louisiana, and were also in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, inasmuch as the action complained of denied to the complainant the equal protection of the laws, and deprived it of its property without due process of law.

The respondent took issue upon these allegations, and avers that complainant has credits within the state, amenable to the taxing power, and the assessment upon the $175,000 was legal and valid.

Testimony was taken by a special examiner under an order of court, and the case partially heard, and was then referred to a master, who made separate findings of fact and conclusions of law.

[390] *From the testimony adduced and the findings of the fact of the master, it appears that the complainant has had an average of $20,000 on deposit in money in the banks of New Orleans, upon which it has paid taxes annually. It has also paid an annual license tax upon business done. The assessment upon the $175,000 arises from moneys advanced by the local agent of the Comptoir in New Orleans upon transactions wherein customers draw checks, in the ordinary form, upon the Comptoir, and at the same time deposit collateral sufficient to secure the amount of money advanced, accompanying the check and collateral with a power of attorney, reciting, among other things, that, whenever the customer shall become indebted to the Comptoir for money lent or for any overdraft upon any check, the Comptoir is to have a lien upon the securities deposited, and upon failure to reimburse any overdraft, or to pay any indebtedness when due, the Comptoir to have the right to sell the collateral, and apply the proceeds upon such liabilities.

The agent of the Comptoir testified that when the money was paid it was remitted back to Paris by an exchange transaction. It also appeared that the agent had authority to make loans as above without consulting the office in Paris, and that the transactions were continuing and large, and amounting to more than a million of dollars a year.

The Comptoir also did a large business in the sale of exchange directly to customers, and relied largely for its gain upon the profits in exchange transactions between this country and Europe. The collateral deposited as security by customers is kept in New Orleans, and is not remitted to the home office in Paris. The money needed for the transactions of the Comptoir arises from foreign exchange drawn from London, Paris, Berlin, etc. Speaking of the transactions from which the present controversy arises, the agent testifies:

Q. Did you charge interest on your overdrafts?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, what evidence of indebtedness, 191 U. S.

besides the account on your books with your customers, have you that these *people owe[391] you anything at all?—A. We have a regular settlement which we make every month.

Q. When you put $50,000, we will say, to the credit of one of your customers on your books, does he give you any receipt for your money previous to your crediting him with that on your books?—A. I do not credit him; I pay him.

Q. You pay him———A. Yes, sir; I pay him the money.

Q. What evidence have you that he owes you anything?—A. I have got a check from him; he is overdrawn on my books.

Q. For the amount you have loaned him?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Zacharie:

Q. Suppose a man comes to you and says, Here, I have got certain securities, certain warehouse receipts or bills of lading, I want to borrow $50,000. You say to him, We will let you have it. Now he deposits with you these bills of lading or these warehouse receipts or these bonds, whatever you choose to accept as security for the loan. Do you give him a receipt for those?—A. No. I am going to explain the business. Well, a client comes to me and says to me, and says I want $50,000, and I propose to give you such collateral, bills of lading for cotton or for grain or warehouse receipts or bonded warehouse receipts for cotton or for cake or cotton seed meal—any kind of those products. If I approve, ready to do the business, I say, Yes. Well, there are two ways of letting him—that money; very often I open a credit in his favor on the Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris in Paris or in London, then he draws against that credit—I mean to say, he sells his draft to the Comptoir to anybody he pleases, either in New Orleans or New York, if the loan is for a short period. Instead of asking him to draw I will draw it myself and hand him the money.

Q. You sell your own exchange?—A. Then he is overdrawn on my books, and to show that he is overdrawn I tell him, You draw a check on me, and he gives me that check. And then I make him sign a general letter of hypothecation (which will *be[392] shown to the attorney). Outside of that we have nothing of importance—I don't see anything else.

Q. These securities and checks remain in your office here in New Orleans?—A. Yes, sir: the checks are cash vouchers for the cashier, who has them to show that he paid the money.

Q. Suppose that the amount drawn by him does not come up to the amount of the value of this hypothecation, this hypothe-cated stuff, what is done there, at the close of the transaction?—A. The general letter of hypothecation does not state any amount. It states simply it is a power of attorney.

Q. I say, what is done when the transaction is concluded? He has got all of the money that you agreed to give him, and the collaterals in your hands are worth more than that. What do you do there?—A. We have a margin. You mean to say if the collateral is worth more than the money we give him?

Q. Yes.—A. Then we have a margin; then we are protected if there is a fall in the price of the securities he gives us.

By Mr. Dupre:

Q. Does he take back the check he has given.—A. No, sir.

Q. When the transaction is concluded what becomes of that check that he has drawn against your bank?—A. The check is a cash voucher; it stays among the cash vouchers of the day on which it is paid and remains perpetually in the custody of the Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris for the cashier to show that he has paid that check.

Q. In other words, it is not returned to the man when he pays his debt?—A. Because we keep an account current which varies each day.

Q. The agent of the Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris in New Orleans has full authority to act for the Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris in this city?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He does not have to confer by cable or otherwise with his principals in Paris or France as to whether he will make one loan or another, a particular loan?—A. He has authority to loan certain amounts, or make certain transactions by exchange according to instructions he has from the other side.

[393] *Q. I mean, if I went in there he would not have to cable to ask about me?—A. No, sir.

Q. When in answer to the 5th interrogatory you say the money was obtained by drawing foreign exchange on Europe, you mean to say that the cash which you lent in the city of New Orleans was obtained by drawing this foreign exchange on Europe and getting it cashed here in the banks?—A. Getting it in New York.

Q. And the cash was forwarded to you from New York?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was the money that you lent?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know, or can you state approximately, the amount of loans that you made during the year 1900?—A. No, I cannot.

Q. About?—A. Well, I made so many loans, you know, for a short period, and I can't state the total amount; it would be too far away, the exact amount.

Q. Was it over a million dollars?—A. Taken it altogether, yes.

Q. How much over a million?—A. I do not know.

Q. Was it ever two millions?—A. No, sir.

Q. As I understand you, a great many of these loans were for short periods, so that you turned the money over and over again during the year?—A. Yes, sir.

The master summarized his conclusion of fact as follows:

"To sum up the facts: It is found that the complainant has paid its annual license tax on its exchange business, as provided by law, and has paid, or offered to pay, its annual tax on the average amount of $20,000 of money on deposit in Louisiana; and that the assessment complained of, of $175,000 for the year 1901, is on the credits accruing to it from the advances made by it in New Orleans, through its agents here, on bills of lading and similar documents by way of collateral. These credits were either in the form of credits on Paris or London, giving *the right to the Louisiana debtors to draw [394] on the complainant in Paris or London, or they were transactions at short time by which the debtors were overdrawn on the books. In both cases, they amounted to overdrafts secured by collateral. In the previous year, which is not now in question, the complainant took non-negotiable notes to represent these credits, and these were considered in the case in the 52 Annual, which will be hereafter referred to again; but in the instant case, for the year 1901, the question is of these overdrafts."

Messrs. H. Garland Dupre and F. C. Zacharie argued the cause, and, with Mr. E. K. Skinner, filed a brief for appellants:

Over and over again has the right of the state to tax personal property within its limits been upheld, even where the owner was neither a citizen nor a resident of the state imposing the tax.

While tangible personal property by a fiction of law has been said to follow the domicile of its owner, it may be taxed at its actual situs; but it has never been held that an incorporeal thing, a mere abstraction, such as the naked obligation to pay a debt, could be so taxed, for an incorporeal thing, being an abstraction, can have no situs.

A mortgage, so far as taxation is concerned, is a mere security. Hence, the question of the situs of notes and bonds is generally held not to be affected by the fact that the paper was or was not secured by mortgage, or, if so secured, by the location of the mortgaged premises.

In the taxation of personal property, two inconsistent doctrines often come into conflict: the one, Mobilia sequuntur personam, commanding that the property shall be taxed at the owner's domicile, on the theory that the personality has no other situs; the other, that it shall be taxed, like real property, where it is situated. Ordinarily the first rule will prevail; and, as a general rule, personal property is taxable at the domicile of its owner.

In regard to assets evidenced by negotiable bills, notes, and bonds, there are two lines of decisions. The view which is probably more logical is that the paper is mere evidence of indebtedness, and that the debt itself can have no actual situs, wherever the paper may be. Hence, the situs, in the eye of the law, is, as in the case of ordinary debts, at the residence of the creditor.

In paying the tax upon the average balance in New Orleans, the Comptoir recognizes the correctness of the decisions that money sent by a foreign creditor to its local agent in another state, to be there employed in business and retained there for investment, under the protection of its laws, is liable to be taxed. Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

The Constitution of the state of Louisiana of 1898, article 225, declares that all property shall be assessed in proportion to its value. Section 1 of the act of 1898, passed by the general assembly of the state, defines "property" to include "all personal property, all rights, credits, bonds, and securities, promissory notes, open accounts, and other obligations, all cash, all money loaned at interest, and all movable and immovable, corporeal and incorporeal articles or things of value owned and held and controlled within the state of Louisiana by any person in any capacity whatsoever." Section 7 of the act provides that it shall be the duty of the assessor to place upon the tax roll all property subject to taxation. "This shall apply with equal force to any person or persons representing, in this state, business interests that may claim a domicile elsewhere, the intent and purpose being that no nonresident, either by himself or through any agent, shall transact business here without paying to the state a corresponding tax with that exacted of its own citizens; and all bills receivable, obligations, or credits arising *from busi-[400]ness done in this state, are hereby declared assessable within this state, and at the business domicile of said nonresident, his agent, or representative." This act undertakes to give to the state the right and authority to assess and collect taxes upon all bills receivable, obligations, and credits within the state.

This legislation was before this court in the case of New Orleans v. Stempel, 175 U. S. 309, 44 L. ed. 174, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, in which it was sought to tax certain notes secured by mortgage on real estate in the city of New Orleans. The notes were owned in New York, but were in the hands of an agent of the owner in New Orleans, who collected the proceeds thereof and the interest as it became due, and deposited the same in a bank at New Orleans. In that case, the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, construing its Constitution and laws, particularly the act in question, were exhaustively reviewed by Mr. Justice Brewer, and the conclusion reached that the act, as interpreted by the supreme court of the state, permitted the taxing of the notes in the hands of the agent, and that such action did not impair any right secured by the Federal Constitution. Since the decisions which were in review in the Stempel Case, the supreme court of Louisiana, in a suit brought by the present complainant against the board of assessors, has had before it a case involving the right to tax credits and moneys of the complainant under a state of facts in most respects identical with that now before the court, the difference being that when the Comptoir loaned money upon bills of lading or other collateral security, it took the non-negotiable note of its customer, which note was canceled either by the payment of the amount due or the exhaustion of the collateral. Comptoir National D'Escompte de Paris v. Board of Assessors, 52 La. Ann. 1319, 27 So. 801. In the method of doing business shown in the present case, instead of giving a non-nego-liable note, the customer gives to the Comptoir his check, which check is not returned, but held as an evidence of the indebtedness, and is later sent to the office of the Comptoir at Paris. While called "checks," and so [401] referred to in the "record and by the parties in their dealings, the instrument delivered to the Comptoir, in form an ordinary check, as though drawn for payment on presentation from moneys deposited, had no such function. The money was paid to the customer upon the security of the collateral, and the so-called check taken and held as a memorandum of the indebtedness to the Comptoir.

The exact question is whether these checks, secured by collateral held by the agent, are evidence of credits for money loaned upon interest, having a local situs in New Orleans, and constitutionally taxable within the meaning of the Louisiana statutes.

In this case we are not dealing with that branch of the business of the Comptoir which relates to bills of exchange sold to its customers, but the assessment is sought to be made upon those credits which arise when money is loaned and advanced or paid in the state to the customer upon collateral security, and the latter's check is taken therefor. The transaction from which the alleged credits arise is briefly this: The customer applies for a loan of money, and offers as security a bill of lading or other collateral, and the money is paid to him. Instead of a note the Comptoir takes the check of the customer, which is regarded as an overdraft, upon which the customer can make payment from time to time and upon which he is charged interest, and, upon the nonpayment of the check, the collateral is subject to sale.

Is this a credit, for money lent on interest, taxable under the laws of Louisiana as interpreted by the supreme court of that state?

The real transaction between the parties was intended to create and did create a debt held for the Comptoir by its agent in the state of Louisiana, and evidenced by the check, and secured by the collateral, which debt, when paid, created a fund in the hands of the agent subject to loan and reinvestment by him without consultation with the principal, in such sense as to localize the credit for the purpose of taxation as effectively [402] "as it would if a non-negotiable note had been taken, as was done in the case decided in 52 Louisiana, supra. It is true that the agent testifies that the money when repaid was remitted by an exchange transaction to Paris, and the average balance in money in New Orleans banks was $20,000, which has been assessed without objection; but it is equally clear that the transactions of this kind were large and the funds subject to the control of the agent, who could lend them at will to customers.

Whether this change, from notes to checks, was purposely made with a view to escaping taxation, as is argued by the respondents, or is a different method of evidencing the debt for the convenience of the customer, as is argued by the complainant, it is, in our judgment, equally a credit for money lent, localized in Louisiana, within the scope of the taxing laws of that state as construed by its supreme court.

Was the attempted taxation in violation of the Federal Constitution?

Speaking to this subject, in New Orleans v. Stempel, 175 U. S. 309, 44 L. ed. 174, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, Mr. Justice Brewer said:

"When the question is whether property is exempt from taxation, and that exemption depends alone on a true construction of a statute of the state, the Federal courts should be slow to declare an exemption in advance of any decision by the courts of the state. The rule in such a case is that the Federal courts follow the construction placed upon the statute by the state courts, and in advance of such construction they should not declare property beyond the scope of the statute, and exempt from taxation, unless it is clear that such is the fact. In other words, they should not release any property within the state from its liability to state taxation unless it is obvious that the statutes of the state warrant such exemption, or unless the mandates of the Federal Constitution compel it."

It may be taken as a general rule of the law of taxation of personal property that such property can only be taxed at the residence of the owner, or at such place as it has acquired a situs, which will subject it to the taxing power of the state "where found." [403] In its application to tangible property, there is little difficulty in applying this principle. The difficulty arises in determining whether a credit or chose in action has acquired a local situs in contemplation of law at a place other than the domicile of the owner in such sense as will permit the state to tax it in the place of its localization. The cases are numerous, both state and Federal, which recognize the right of the state, in view of the protection and remedial rights which its laws give to the owner of intangible property, such as notes and bills, to require from such property a contribution to the funds of the state, to be collected by taxation, for the purpose of maintaining and enforcing the laws which give force and effect to such obligations. This right has been the subject of such recent adjudication in this court that we will only notice some of the later decisions. We have already referred to New Orleans v. Stempel. The question came before the court in Bristol v. Washington County, 177 U. S. 133, 44 L. ed. 701, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, in which case it was held that the personal property of a nonresident of the state of Minnesota, in the shape of notes payable at the office of the agent in Minnesota, where the mortgages securing the notes were retained by the agents, and the notes were returned from time to time when required for renewal, collection, or foreclosure, the agents collecting the money and making loans in the name of the principal, generally on their own judgment, remitting to the principal the collections when required, or investing them in new loans, was properly taxable in Minnesota. Still later the subject was under consideration in Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, in which it was held that a deposit by a citizen of Illinois in a trust company in New York was within the taxing power of the latter state, even though the depositor intended to withdraw the money for further investment, and although the deposit had been subjected to taxation in Illinois as a part of an estate to which it belonged.

[404] From these cases it may be taken as the settled law of this court that there is no inhibition in the Federal Constitution against the right of the state to tax property in the shape of *credits, where the same are evidenced by notes or obligations held within the state, in the hands of an agent of the owner for the purpose of collection or renewal, with a view to new loans and carrying on such transactions as a permanent business.

The maxim, Mobilia sequuntur personam, which was applied in the court below as forbidding taxation of the checks in the hands of the agent in New Orleans, has been frequently held to be but a fiction of law, having its origin in considerations of general convenience and public policy, and not to be applied to limit and control the right of the state to tax property within the jurisdiction, it being intended to permit the owner to deal with his personalty according to the law of his domicile, and to make testamentary disposition of it according to the law where he is rather than that of the situs of the property. It was intended for convenience, and not to be controlling where justice does not demand it.

Applying these principles to the facts in the case, we have no doubt that these checks, secured in the manner stated, and given for the purpose of evidencing an interest-bearing debt, were the evidences of credits for money loaned, localized in Louisiana, protected by its laws, and properly taxable there.

The Comptoir was a foreign corporation; its business in Louisiana was in the hands of an agent; it furnished to the customer a sum of money and took from him a collateral security; for reasons satisfactory to the parties, instead of taking the ordinary evidence of indebtedness, the customer drew a check, never intended to be paid in the ordinary way, but intended by the parties to be held as evidence of the amount of money actually loaned; this loan could be satisfied by partial payments from time to time, interest being charged upon the outstanding amounts, and if not paid at maturity the collateral was subject to sale; when paid, the money might be again loaned by the agent to other parties, or remitted to the home office, and the business was continuing in its character.

It is true the money to be paid to the customer was generally *obtained by the Comptoir drawing its draft upon New York or upon its home office, and a large part of the business of the Comptoir was in selling foreign exchange, but we cannot perceive that the transaction between the parties was any the less a loan because of the source from which the money was obtained.

We find nothing in the requirements of the Federal Constitution or the statutes of the state of Louisiana, as construed by its supreme court, which should exempt such property from bearing its burden of taxation for the public benefit. It follows that the circuit court erred in holding otherwise, and in granting a perpetual injunction.

Decree reversed and cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill.

JOSEPH E. BLACKBURN, Dairy and Food
Commissioner of the State of Ohio.

Appeal—review of judgment of circuit court of appeals—suit arising under Federal Constitution.

A bill to enjoin a state official from charging that coffee coated with a glaze of sugar and eggs comes within the prohibition of the Ohio pure food law (2 Bates's Ohio Stat. 1897, p. 2229, tit. 5, chap. a), against coating an article to conceal damage or inferiority, or to make it appear better or of greater value than it really is, and to restrain him from instituting proceedings to prevent its sale, does not present a case arising under the Federal Constitution so as to deprive the decree of the circuit court of appeals therein of that finality which exists, under the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, § 6, U. S. Stat. 1901, p. 550), when the case is one in which the jurisdiction of the lower court depends entirely upon diverse citizenship, although it contains averments that the construction which such official places upon the statute will render it repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

Argued November 10, 1903. Decided December 7, 1903.

APPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit to review a decree of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Ohio, dismissing a bill to restrain the state dairy and food commissioner from charging that a certain article came within the prohibition of the Ohio pure food law, and from threatening or instituting prosecutions for the violation of such law. Dismissed.

See same case below, 51 C. C. A. 122, 113 Fed. 616.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

[406] *This was a bill filed by Arbuckle Brothers against Joseph E. Blackburn, as dairy and food commissioner of the state of Ohio, to restrain him from certain action on his part as such officer, including prosecutions for violation of pure food laws of the state.

After a jurisdictional clause setting forth diversity of citizenship, the bill averred that by an act of the general assembly of the state of Ohio, passed in the year 1884, entitled "An Act to Provide Against the Adulteration of Food and Drugs," as amended by an act passed in the year 1890, entitled "An Act to Amend Section 3 of an Act Entitled 'An Act to Provide Against the Adulteration of Food and Drugs,' Passed March 20, 1884," which act was still in full force and virtue, it was provided that no person should, within the state of Ohio, manufacture for sale, offer for sale, or sell, any article of food which was adulterated within the meaning of said act, and that the term "food" used therein should include all articles used for food or drink by man, whether simple, mixed, or compound. That it was further provided that food should be deemed adulterated "(1) If any substance or substances had been mixed with it, so as to lower or depreciate, or injuriously affect its quality, strength, or purity; (2) If any inferior or cheaper substance or substances have been substituted wholly or in part for it; (3) If any valuable or necessary constituent or ingredient has been wholly or in part abstracted from it; (4) If it is an imitation of, or is sold under the name of, another article; (5) If it consists wholly, or in part, of a diseased, decomposed, putrid, infected, tainted, or rotten animal or vegetable substance or article, whether manufactured or not; or, in the case of milk, if it is the product of a diseased animal; (6) If it is colored, coated, polished, or powdered, whereby damage or inferiority is concealed, or if by any means it is made to appear better or of greater value than it really is; (7) If it contains any added substance or ingredient which is poisonous or injurious to health; provided, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to mixtures or compounds recognized *as ordi- [407] nary articles or ingredients of articles of food, if each and every package sold or offered for sale be distinctly labeled as mixtures or compounds, with the name and per cent of each ingredient therein, and are not injurious to health."

The bill alleged that for more than thirty years complainants and their predecessors had been engaged, and still were, in the manufacture and sale throughout the United States, including the state of Ohio, of a certain compound or mixture known as Ariosa, —composed of roasted coffee, compounded and mixed with eggs and sugar, whereby the separate beans were coated, and to a large extent hermetically sealed after roasting with a compound of sugar and eggs, the original strength and aroma of the coffee being thus preserved, and deterioration prevented; that the coffee, eggs, and sugar were each "a common, healthy, and unobjectionable article of food;" that Ariosa had acquired great reputation, and the good will of the business of its manufacture and sale had become very valuable; that it was sold in Ohio in packages, each of which, in compliance with the laws of Ohio in respect to the adulteration of food, was distinctly labeled with a printed statement of the precise composition and the proportion of each of the ingredients of the article.

And it was charged that, notwithstanding these facts, defendant, as dairy and food commissioner of Ohio, had notified complainants that he considered Ariosa, as put up by them, an adulteration; that he had issued a circular letter to dealers and vendors, wrongfully asserting that complainants, in the manufacture and sale thereof, refused to abide by the laws of Ohio in that behalf; and that he proposed to institute prosecutions to prevent and punish its sale or offer for sale in Ohio.

By the 16th paragraph of the bill it was averred that "said statute, construed as respondent claims it should be, is in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and void, in that it would deprive complainants of their aforesaid property," and would deny them "equal protection of the law."

[408] And by the 17th paragraph it was averred that Ariosa *was shipped to and sold in Ohio in original packages, "and said statute, if construed as the respondent herein claims it should be, is a regulation by the said state of Ohio of interstate commerce, and is repugnant to, and in violation of, the 3d clause of § 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, and void."

That if "respondent be permitted to commit the threatened wrongs, the same will, as complainants are informed and believe, damage complainants to the extent of more than $100,000,—an amount largely in excess of respondent's ability to respond in judgment."

The prayer was that the commissioner be restrained from charging that Ariosa was an article of food adulterated within the meaning of the statute, and that the use of the process of coating and glazing the coffee with the preparation of sugar and eggs, and the importation and sale constituted violations of the statute; from threatening dealers with prosecution; and from instituting or commencing prosecutions.

The case came on to be heard on complainants' application for a preliminary injunction, and was submitted on pleadings and evidence, whereupon the circuit court entered a decree denying the injunction, and dismissing the bill, which decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, 51 C. C. A. 122, 113 Fed. 616, and the case then brought here by appeal.

Messrs. John DeWitt Warner and Clarence Brown argued the cause and filed a brief for appellants.

Mr. Edmond B. Dillon argued the cause, and, with Mr. Roscoe J. Mauck, filed a brief for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

[413] We are of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed, because *the jurisdiction of the circuit court was "dependent entirely upon the opposite parties to the suit or controversy being citizens of different states," and the decree of the circuit court of appeals was final. Act of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, § 6, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 550.

The circuit courts have "original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of two thousand dollars, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, . . . or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, in which the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value aforesaid, . . ." Act of March 3, 1887, 24 Stat. at L. 552, chap. 373; act of August 13, 1888, 25 Stat. at L. 433, chap. 866, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 508.

In the present case the circuit court had jurisdiction on the ground of diverse citizenship; but it is now contended that jurisdiction also rested on the ground that the suit was one arising under the Constitution of the United States.

The rule is firmly established that a suit does not so arise unless it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy as to the effect or construction of the Constitution, upon the determination of which the result depends, and which appears on the record by a statement in legal and logical form, such as is required in good pleading. Defiance Water Co. v. Defiance, 191 U. S. 184, ante, 140, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 63, and cases cited.

The averments of this bill did not bring the case within that rule, for they put forward no existing controversy as to the effect or construction of the Constitution, on which the relief depended, and set up no right which might be defeated or sustained according to such construction.

By the laws of Ohio the office of dairy and food commissioner was created, and it was made the duty of that officer to attend to the enforcement of all the laws against fraud and *adulteration or impurities in food,[414] drink, or drugs; to appoint assistant commissioners; and to employ such experts, chemists, agents, inspectors, and counsel as he might deem necessary for the proper enforcement of the laws; and that it was also made his duty to inspect any articles made or offered for sale as articles of food or drink, and to prosecute, or cause to be prosecuted, any person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations engaged in the manufacture or sale of any article of food or drink adulterated in violation of any laws of the state. 1 Bates' Anno. Stat. (Ohio) 1897, p. 262, title III., chap. 18.

By the act of 1884, as amended in 1890, and set out in the bill, it was provided, among other things, that food should be deemed adulterated "if it is colored, coated, polished, or powdered, whereby damage or inferiority is concealed, or if by any means it is made to appear better or of greater value than it really is." 2 Bates' Anno. Stat. (Ohio) 1897, p. 2229, title V., chap. A. The proviso excepted mixtures and compounds, recognized as ordinary articles of food, not injurious to health, and labeled as required.

It is not asserted that this police regulation is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, but it is said that when the commissioner, in the discharge of his duty under the law, reached the conclusion that the coating of Ariosa with a glaze of sugar and eggs was calculated to conceal damage or inferiority, and to make the article appear better or of greater value than it really was, and that the article was not a compound or mixture, and proposed to prosecute, he thereby construed the act in a way, which, if his construction were correct, would render it unconstitutional.

But these were findings of fact which resulted in bringing the article within the prohibition, and excluded it from the proviso, and neither findings nor prosecutions would in themselves constitute a deprivation of property, or a denial of the equal protection of the law, by the state, or any direct interference with interstate commerce, and the constitutionality of the statute was conceded.

[415] *The suggested controversy was purely hypothetical, and based the supposed constitutional objections on the contingency that, on issues of fact, it might be judicially determined that Ariosa came within the statute, which complainants denied.

If the commissioner's conclusions were erroneous, the courts were open for the correction of the error, and the possibility that they might agree with the commissioner could not be laid hold of as tantamount to an actual controversy as to the effect of the Constitution on the determination of which the result of the present suit depended. Indeed, in the only case called to our attention by counsel involving the status of Ariosa, the court of common pleas of Lucas county, Ohio, held that it was not within the prohibition of the statute. White v. Ohio, 12 Ohio N. P. 659.

Reference to the Constitution to strengthen objections to a particular construction, or the pursuit of a certain course of conduct, is not sufficient to invoke jurisdiction. Whatever grounds of equity interposition may have existed here,—and we express no opinion on that subject,—the jurisdiction of the circuit court as a court of the United States depended alone on diverse citizenship. If the allegation of that fact had been omitted from the bill, the jurisdiction could not have been maintained.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Justice Day took no part in the disposition of the case.

v.

UNITED STATES, for the use, etc.†

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 416-427.)

Principal and surety—extension of time for payment—discharge of surety.

A sixty-day extension of time for the payment of a bill for materials furnished to the principal obligor by a third party does not, at least in the absence of any evidence of loss thereby occasioned, discharge the surety on a bond conditioned not only for the faithful performance of the original contract with the United States for the construction of a public work, but for the prompt payment of all persons supplying labor and materials in the prosecution of such work.

Argued October 30, 1903. Decided December 7, 1903.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, presenting questions as to the discharge of a surety by extensions of time of payment. Answered in the negative.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was an action originally begun in the circuit court for the district of Colorado by the United States, for the use and benefit of the Golden Pressed & Fire Brick Company (hereinafter called the brick company) against John A. McIntyre and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company (hereinafter termed the guaranty company), upon a bond executed April 11, 1898, in pursuance of an act of Congress of August 13, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 278, chap. 280, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2523), to secure the performance of a contract theretofore entered into by McIntyre with the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish all the labor and materials, and do all the work required for the foundation and superstructure of a mint in the city of Denver.

The questions certified are founded upon the following facts: McIntyre, having agreed to erect the building, executed a bond to the United States, with the guaranty company as surety, conditioned not only upon the faithful performance of his work to erect the building according to his contract, and to any changes or additions made thereto, but to "promptly make payment to all persons supplying him labor or material [417] in *the prosecution of the work contemplated by said contract." During the progress of the work the brick company furnished the contractor brick for the construction of the building to the amount of $6,517.55, which had been reduced by payments to $2,711.65, for which the action was brought.

†This case is reported by the Official Reporter under the title of "Guaranty Co. v. Pressed Brick Co."

NOTE.—On release of surety by extension of time of payment—see notes to Miller v. Stewart, 6 L. ed. U. S. 189; Creath v. Sims, 12 L. ed. U. S. 111; and Bank of Uniontown v. Mackey, 35 L. ed. U. S. 486.

The defendant denied its liability upon the ground that on October 1, 1898, the brick company, without the knowledge or consent of the guaranty company, granted to McIntyre an extension of the time of payment of the balance then due on account of the purchase price of such brick; and accepted two promissory notes, one for thirty days after date (October 1), and another sixty days after September 15, 1898, the first one of which was paid. There was no allegation that, by reason of the extension of the time of payment of the sum so due on October 1, the guaranty company had sustained any loss or injury, but it was insisted that it was nevertheless thereby released and discharged from any further liability upon such bond.

The circuit court held that the extension did not operate to discharge the guaranty company from its liability, and the circuit court of appeals, to which the case was carried, certified to this court the following questions of law arising from these facts:

"First. Did the action of the brick company on October 1, 1898, in taking two promissory notes, one for the sum of $1,275 and the other for the sum of $2,508.10, for the amount of the brick company's account, then due and payable, one of said notes running for thirty days and the other for sixty days, and each bearing 10 per cent interest per annum from date, operate to discharge the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company from its liability, assumed under the provisions of the aforesaid bond, to pay to the Golden Pressed & Fire Brick Company the amount of said indebtedness?

"Second. Did the extension of the time of payment of the balance due from said McIntyre, on October 1, 1898, by the taking of two notes in the manner and form aforesaid, [418] operate *to discharge the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company of its liability to pay the amount of said indebtedness to the brick company, irrespective of the question whether said guaranty company did or did not sustain an actual loss or damage on account of such extension?"

191 U. S.

Mr. Andrew W. Gillette argued the cause, and, with Mr. James H. Brown, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The contract of the plaintiff in error is one of suretyship, and as such is to be strictly construed.

United States v. American Bonding & T. Co. 32 C. C. A. 420, 61 U. S. App. 584, 89 Fed. 925; United States use of Schumacker v. McIntyre, 111 Fed. 590; United States v. Freckl, 92 Fed. 299, Affirmed in 39 C. C. A. 491, 99 Fed. 237.

The extent of the surety's obligation to laborers and materialmen is to be determined in each instance by the language of the bond read in the light of the terms as to payment of such obligee's contract with the principal. It cannot be determined from the bond alone what was the price of the brick, nor what would be prompt payment therefor.

The statutory bond in suit imposes upon the surety a dual obligation: (1) To the government for the completion of the principal contract; (2) to laborers and materialmen to see that they are promptly paid. These obligations are entirely separate and distinct.

Mr. T. J. O'Donnell argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

This contract should be construed with due regard to the fact that it is given in pursuance of a statute, and so construed that the object of the statute may be promoted. The statute being remedial, the construction must be one that will advance the remedy.

Wood v. Brown, 43 C. C. A. 474, 104 Fed. 203.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

This bond was given in pursuance of the act of 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 278, chap. 280, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2523), "for the protection of persons furnishing materials and labor for the construction of public works." The act *requires, in substance, that [423] persons contracting with the United States for the construction of any public building, etc., shall be required, before commencing such work, to execute the usual penal bond, "with the additional obligations that such contractor or contractors shall promptly make payments to all persons supplying him or them labor and materials in the prosecution of the work provided for in such contract," with a right on the part of the materialman to bring suit in the name of the United States for his use and benefit against the contractor and his sureties. The bond in this case contained two entirely distinct and separate obligations: First, that McIntyre should fulfil all the conditions and covenants of his contract, whatever changes in or additions to such contract might thereafter be made; and, second, promptly make payment to all persons supplying him labor and materials in the prosecution of the work. Of course, these covenants are to be read together, and the latter interpreted in the light of the former.

The question involved is whether the ordinary rule that exonerates the guarantor in case the time fixed for the performance of the contract by the principal be extended applies to a bond of this kind, executed by a guaranty company not only for a faithful performance of the original contract, but for the payment of the debts of the principal obligor to third parties. It is conceded that, by the general law of suretyship, any change whatever in the contract for the performance of which the guarantor is liable, made without his consent, such, for instance, as an extension of time for payment, if made upon sufficient consideration, discharges the guarantor from liability. Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 681, 6 L. ed. 190; Smith v. United States, 2 Wall. 219, 17 L. ed. 788; Reese v. United States, 9 Wall. 13, 19 L. ed. 541.

Counsel for the brick company argued with much persuasiveness that this rule of strictissimi juris, though universally accepted as applicable to the undertaking of an ordinary guarantor, who is usually moved to lend his signature by motives of friendship or expectation of reciprocity, and without pecuniary *consideration, has no application [424] to the guaranty companies, recently created, which undertake, upon the payment of a stipulated compensation, and as a strictly business enterprise, to indemnify or insure the obligee in the bond against any failure of the obligor to perform his contract. It is, at least, open to doubt, however, whether any relaxation of the rule should be permitted as between the obligee and the guarantor, which may have signed the guaranty in reliance upon the rule of strictissimi juris, and with the understanding that it is entitled to the ordinary protection accorded to guarantors against changes in the contract or extensions of the time of payment. The government wisely protects itself in these cases by providing in the bond that the obligation of the surety shall extend to all changes in or additions to the contract, which may thereafter be made,—a clause which we have held extends to such changes as might be found advantageous or necessary in the plans or specifications, but does not extend to a change in the location of the structure to be built. United States v. Frecl, 186 U. S. 309, 46 L. ed. 1177, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 875. But no provision was made in the bond in that case with respect to the obligation of the principal and his surety to make payment to all persons supplying labor or material to the contractor in the prosecution of his work.

We do not, however, deem it necessary to express an opinion upon this subject, as we prefer to rest our decision upon the peculiar character of the covenant upon which this action is brought. In an ordinary guaranty the guarantor understands perfectly the nature and extent of his obligation. If he becomes surety for the performance of a building contract, he is presumed to know the parties, the terms of their undertaking, the extent and feasibility of the work to be done, the character and responsibility of the principal obligor, and his ability to carry out the contract. If he guarantees the payment of a particular debt, he usually knows the exact amount of the debt, the time when it matures, and something of the ability of the principal to meet it. If he becomes responsible for the payment of the principal's [425] debts generally, or lends his credit *to a proposed purchaser of goods, he knows the amount of his liability, and the means of his principal to meet them. In such cases he contracts in reliance upon the exact terms of his principal's undertaking, and has a right to suppose that no change will be made without his consent; and the courts have gone so far as to hold that any change will exonerate him, though it really redound to his benefit.

This covenant, however, is inserted for an entirely different purpose from that of securing to the government the performance of the contract for the construction of the building. Inasmuch as neither the contractor nor his subcontractor can secure themselves by a mechanic's lien upon the proposed building, the government, solely for the protection of the latter requires a covenant for the prompt payment of his claims, and the same security that it requires for the performance of the principal contract. In this covenant the surety guarantees nothing to the principal obligee,—the government,—though the latter permits an action upon the bond for the benefit of the subcontractors. The covenant is made solely for their benefit. The guarantor is ignorant of the parties with whom his principal may contract, the amount, the nature, and the value of the materials required, as well as the time when payment for them will become due. These particulars it would probably be impossible even for the principal to furnish, and it is to be assumed that the surety contracts with knowledge of this fact. Not knowing when or by whom these materials will be supplied, or when the bills for them will mature, it can make no difference to him whether they were originally purchased on a credit of sixty days, or whether, after the materials are furnished, the time for payment is extended sixty days, and a note given for the amount maturing at that time. If a person deliberately contracts for an uncertain liability, he ought not to complain when that uncertainty becomes certain.

Stress is laid upon the fact that the defendant company guaranteed that the principal obligor should "promptly" make payment to his materialmen, and that this, properly interpreted, *required that the con-[426] tractor should pay at once upon the maturity of the bills, and that as such bills became due October 1, 1898, the promptness guaranteed required their immediate payment. We are not impressed with the force of this contention. If the word "promptly" has any particular significance in this connection, it is satisfied by such payment as the subcontractor shall accept as having been promptly made; or perhaps it was intended to give him an immediate action upon the bond, in case such payment be not made with sufficient promptness. It was not intended, however, that the want of an immediate payment should be set up as a defense by the surety. As these bills are rarely paid the very day they become due, the narrow construction would destroy the principal value of the security.

The facts of this case do not call for an expression of opinion as to whether, if an unusual credit were given, and in the meantime the principal obligor had become insolvent, or the surety were otherwise damnified by the delay, it might not be exonerated, since neither of these contingencies supervened in this case, and we are remitted to the naked proposition whether the giving of a customary credit, with no evidence of loss thereby occasioned, is sufficient to discharge the surety. We find no difficulty whatever in answering this question in the negative. The rule of strictissimi juris is a stringent one, and is liable at times to work a practical injustice. It is one which ought not to be extended to contracts not within the reason of the rule, particularly when the bond is underwritten by a corporation which has undertaken for a profit to insure the obligee against a failure of performance on the part of the principal obligor. Such a contract should be interpreted liberally in favor of the subcontractor, with a view of furthering the beneficent object of the statute. Of course, this rule would not extend to cases of fraud or unfair dealing on the part of a subcontractor, as was the case in United States use of Heise v. American Bonding & T. Co. 89 Fed. 921, 925, or to cases not otherwise within the scope of the undertaking.

[427] *Bonds containing the covenant in question are not common, though they have sometimes appeared in the state courts, and the construction here given them has been generally adopted (United States use of Snyder v. Hazard, 53 App. Div. 410, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1051), although these cases have generally turned upon the question whether the rights of the materialmen were affected by a change made in the contract by the principals. Dewey v. State, 91 Ind. 173; Conn v. State, 125 Ind. 514, 25 N. E. 443; Steffes v. Lemke, 40 Minn. 27, 41 N. W. 302; Doll v. Crume, 41 Neb. 655, 59 N. W. 806; Kaufmann v. Cooper, 46 Neb. 644, 65 N. W. 796; Griffith v. Rundlc, 23 Wash. 453, 55 L. R. A. 381, 63 Pac. 199.

Both of the questions certified are answered in the negative.

LA REPUBLIQUE FRANCAISE et al., Petitioners, ,
v.

SARATOGA VICHY SPRING COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 427-441.)

Unfair competition—exclusive right to use of word "Vichy" in connection with mineral water—laches—nullum tempus—equitable relief.

1. The exclusive right to the use of the word "Vichy," under which the waters of the springs of a commune in France of that name have been known for centuries, belongs to the owner of such springs as against every one whose waters are not drawn therefrom, or, at least, from the same hydrographical region, which may be called generally the basin of Vichy.

2. The rule of nullum tempus cannot be invoked by the French Republic to answer the defense of laches in a suit to enforce an exclusive right to the use of the word "Vichy" in connection with mineral waters as against persons using that word to denote a water not drawn from springs in the commune of France of that name, where it has entered into an eighty-year lease of such springs to its complainant for a fixed annual rental, which lease has still thirty years to run.
3. No exemption from the defense of laches to a suit by the French Republic and its lessee of the Vichy springs to enforce an exclusive right to the use of the word "Vichy" in connection with mineral waters as against persons using that word to denote waters not drawn from springs in the commune of France of that name was effected by the declaration in the treaty with France of June 11, 1887, art. 8, that "the commercial name shall be protected in all the countries of the Union without obligation of deposit, whether it forms part or not of a trade or commercial mark."
4. Equity will not enforce the right to an exclusive use of the word "Vichy" in connection with mineral waters, which by long adverse use has become generic, as against persons using that word to denote a water not drawn from springs in a commune in France of that name, where no attempt whatever was made to simulate the labels on the imported water, and the two waters not only differ in their ingredients and taste, but one is a still, and the other is an effervescing, water.

Argued November 4, 1903. Decided December 7, 1903.

ON CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment which reversed a judgment of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York, dismissing a bill to enforce an exclusive right to the use of the word "Vichy" in connection with mineral water, and granted an injunction against the use of any label in which the place of origin of the water was not as prominently displayed as the word "Vichy." Affirmed.

See same case below, 46 C. C. A. 418, 107 Fed. 459.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a bill in equity brought in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York by the French Republic, as owner, and La Compagnie Fermière de l'Etablissement Thermal de Vichy (hereinafter termed the Vichy company), as lessee, of the springs of Vichy, France, against the Saratoga Vichy Spring Company, for the unlawful use of the word "Vichy," claimed by the plaintiffs as a commercial name or trade-mark, and appropriated for the waters of the defendant, which are drawn from a certain natural spring at Saratoga, New York.

Defense: That for fifty years mineral water has been sold throughout the world under the name of "Vichy," and that such name has come to denote a type of water, namely, alkaline, noncathartic, carbonated water, and does not stand for the water of any one spring; that defendant has never sold Vichy as and for that of the plaintiffs, nor in resemblance thereto, but has so labeled its water that the purchaser shall know that it is a natural mineral water of Saratoga; and that plaintiffs' claim is stale.

The bill was dismissed by the circuit court upon the ground that plaintiffs had no exclusive right to the use of the word "Vichy," and that defendant had never been guilty of an attempt to palm off its waters as the imported article. 99 Fed. 733. On appeal, the [429] court of appeals reversed *the decision of the circuit court and granted an injunction against the use of one particular label, or "any other label in which the place of the origin of the water is not as plainly and prominently made known as the fact that it is named 'Vichy.'" 46 C. C. A. 418, 107 Fed. 459.

Plaintiffs thereupon applied for a writ of certiorari, which was granted. Defendant made no similar application, but acquiesced in the decree, and discontinued the offending label.

Messrs. Charles Bulkley Hubbell and Archibald Cox argued the cause and filed a brief for petitioners:

The courts have not accepted the reasoning which leads to the conclusion that, because the suppression of a lie will benefit more than one person, its continuance should be permitted.

The case is the same as if the French government were a patentee and the Vichy company the exclusive licensee; and in such a case there is no question that the owner of the patent would be an indispensable party.

Unless a name of origin has wholly lost its meaning, unless the word "genuine" is without value to differentiate the original article from others bearing the name, proof of its use by others is simply proof of a fraudulent usage. The case of Saxlehner v. Eisner & M. Co. 191 U. S.

179 U. S. 19, 45 L. ed. 60, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, must be regarded as controlling on the main points raised in this case.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is brought to vindicate the right of plaintiffs to the exclusive use of the word "Vichy" as against the defendant, and, incidentally, as against all persons making use of the word to denote a water not drawn from the springs of Vichy, now owned by the French Republic, and leased to the Vichy company.

The title of the French Republic to the springs of Vichy, a commune of France, is clearly established. Known for their medicinal qualities since the time of the Roman Empire, and originally belonging to the feudal lord of Vichy, they were sold by him in 1444, together with the castle and its dependencies, to Pierre, Duke of Bourbon, in whose family they remained until 1531, when, for the treason of the Constable of Bourbon, they were confiscated by Francis I., and became the property of the Crown, in whose possession they remained until 1790, when they were united to the public domain, and afterwards passed to the French Republic and its successors, and were operated directly by the officers of the state until June, 1853, when they *were leased for [435] a fixed rental to a firm of which the Vichy company is the successor. The bottling and exportation of the waters was commenced before 1716, and in 1853 they began to be exported directly to this country, the shipments in 1893 amounting to about 300,000 bottles. For many years they have been bottled and sold all over the world.

The rights of the defendant originated from a spring discovered in 1872 in the township of Saratoga Springs, New York, the waters of which, though differing from the water of the Vichy spring both in ingredients and taste, have a certain resemblance to them which suggested the use of the word "Vichy." The water began to be bottled and sold in 1873 by the owners of the spring, and in 1876 became the property of the defendant which has since sold the water, using various bottles, circulars, and labels, containing more or less conspicuously displayed the word "Vichy."

1. As the waters of Vichy had been known for centuries under that name, there is reason for saying the plaintiffs had, in 1872, acquired an exclusive right to the use of the word "Vichy" as against every one whose waters were not drawn from the springs of Vichy, or at least, as observed by a French court, "from the same hydrographical region which may be called generally the basin of Vichy."

True the name is geographical; but geographical names often acquire a secondary signification indicative not only of the place of manufacture or production, but of the name of the manufacturer or producer and the excellence of the thing manufactured or produced, which enables the owner to assert an exclusive right to such name as against every one not doing business within the same geographical limits; and even as against them, if the name be used fraudulently for the purpose of misleading buyers as to the actual origin of the thing produced, or of palming off the productions of one person as those of another. Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Co. 179 U. S. 665, 45 L. ed. 365, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270; Newman v. Alvord, 51 N. Y. 189, 10 Am. Rep. 588; Lee v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 155; Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508; Braham v. Beachim*, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 848; Thompson v. Montgomery, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 35; Seizo v. Provezende, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 192.

In a French case arising in this connection, and brought by the Vichy company against a rival company owning two springs in the same neighborhood, complaining that, by the composition of its name and the arrangement of its labels, as well as by the tenor of its different appeals to the public, the company owning these springs had created a damaging confusion between the two companies and their product, it was held that, while the rival company had a right to the use of the word "Vichy," it was bound to state the name of its springs, the place where they were located, as "near Vichy" in letters identical in height and thickness as those of the word Vichy in their advertisements and labels, and also the name of their springs in letters at least half their size,—in other words, it was bound to adopt such precautions as would fully apprise the public that it was not purporting to sell the waters of the original Vichy company, though, being in the same basin, they were entitled to use that designation.

2. A serious difficulty in the way of enforcing an exclusive right on the part of the plaintiffs to the use of the word Vichy is their apparent acquiescence in such use by others. For thirty years the defendant, the Saratoga Vichy Company, has been openly and notoriously bottling and selling its waters under the name of the "Saratoga Vichy" until its competition has become an extremely serious matter to the plaintiffs, whose importations began in 1853 with only 316 bottles, which by the year 1893 had increased to 298,500 bottles. The entire shipment of the Vichy company amounted in 1896 to nearly ten millions of bottles. Under such circumstances, and in view of the further facts that other waters were openly manufactured and sold in this country under the name of Vichy, and that a manufactured water was dealt out by the glass under that name in innumerable soda water fountains throughout the country, as shown by the record in this case, it is impossible to suppose that the plaintiffs were not aware of these infringements *upon their exclusive[437] rights. It argues much more than ordinary indifference and inattention to suppose that the large amount of this rival water could be advertised and sold all over the country without the knowledge of their agents, who would naturally be active in the protection of their own interests, if not the interests of their principals. In fact, they had allowed the name to become generic and indicative of the character of the water. With all these facts before them, and with the yearly increasing sales and competition of the defendant company, no move was made against them for twenty-five years, and until 1898, when this bill was filed. A clearer case of laches could hardly exist. Saxlehner v. Eisner & M. Co. 179 U. S. 19, 36, 45 L. ed. 60, 75, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7.

It is said, however, that the doctrine of laches has no application to the neglect of the government to pursue trespassers upon its rights, and that the French Republic is entitled to the benefit of that rule. It is at least open to doubt whether the maxim nullum tempus, applicable to our own government, can be invoked in behalf of a foreign government suing in our courts. The doctrine is one of public policy, and is based upon the assumption that the officers of the government may be so busily engaged in the ordinary affairs of state as to neglect a vindication of its interests in the courts. Whether this exemption can be set up by a foreign government in the prosecution of suits against our own citizens—in other words, whether the latter are not entitled to the benefit of the ordinary defenses at law—is a question which does not necessarily arise in this case, and as to which we are not called upon to express an opinion.

However this may be, it is clear that the rule of nullum tempus cannot be invoked in this case. While the French Republic is nominally the plaintiff, its interest in the litigation is little, if anything, more than nominal. For fifty years it has ceased to operate these springs through its own agents, since in 1853 the then Emperor of the French leased them to the predecessors of the Vichy company, which has since that time bottled and sold the water under successive leases as its own, upon the payment of an annual rental of 100,000 francs *to the[438] government. Its present lease does not expire until 1934. It thus appears that the French Republic has had no real interest in the product of the springs for fifty years, and that it can have no such interest for thirty years to come. Its only title to sue, then, is in a possible depreciation of the rental value of this property after the lapse of the present lease, caused by the unlawful use of the name Vichy by the defendant. This is quite too inappreciable to answer the defense of laches, and, indeed, it is doubtful whether it justifies its joinder as coplaintiff in the suit. To hold that the French Republic appears in this litigation to be suing for the use and benefit of the Vichy company would more accurately describe their relations.

In such cases either where the government is suing for the use and benefit of an individual, or for the prosecution of a private and proprietary, instead of a public or governmental right, it is clear that it is not entitled to the exemption of nullum tempus, and that the ordinary rule of laches applies in full force. United States v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338, 32 L. ed. 121, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1083; New Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76, 27 L. ed. 656, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 176; Maryland use of Markley v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490, 28 L. ed. 822, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278; United States v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. 142 U. S. 510, 538, 35 L. ed. 1099, 1106, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 308; Curtner v. United States, 149 U. S. 662, 37 L. ed. 890, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 985, 1041; United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 167 U. S. 224, 264, 42 L. ed. 144, 162, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809; Miller v. State, 38 Ala. 600; Moody v. Fleming, 4 Ga. 115, 48 Am. Dec. 210.

The plaintiffs, then, are put in this dilemma: If the Republic be a necessary party to the suit here, as it sues in its private and proprietary capacity, the defense of laches is available against it. Upon the other hand, if it be an unnecessary party, the defense of laches may certainly be set up against the Vichy company, its coplaintiff.

We do not think the position of the plaintiffs in this connection is affected or strengthened by the eighth article of the treaty of June 11, 1887, with France and other nations, known as the Industrial Property Treaty (Comp. of Treaties, 684), which declares that "the commercial name shall be protected in all the countries of the Union [439] without obligation of deposit, *whether it forms part or not of a trade or commercial mark." [25 Stat. at L. p. 1376.] That article was evidently designed merely to protect the citizens of other countries in their right to a trade-mark or commercial name, and their right to sue in the courts of this country, as if they were citizens of the United States. It could never have been intended to put them on a more favorable footing than our own citizens, or to exempt them from the ordinary defenses that might be made by the party prosecuted.

This is made the more apparent from article 2 of the treaty, which reads as follows: "The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting states shall enjoy, in all the other states of the Union, so far as concerns patents for inventions, trade or commercial marks, and the commercial name, the advantages that the respective laws thereof at present accord, or shall afterwards accord to subjects or citizens. In consequence they shall have the same protection as these latter, and the same legal recourse against all infringements of their rights, under reserve of complying with the formalities and conditions imposed upon subjects or citizens by the domestic legislation of each state."

If there were any doubt about the rights of the plaintiffs under the eighth article, they are completely removed by the wording of the second. The rights of the French Republic are the same, and no greater under this article than those of the United States would be.

3. But conceding that the defense of laches would not be available in a case of actual fraud, or an attempt to foist upon the public the waters of the defendant as those of the original Vichy spring (McIntire v. Pryor, 173 U. S. 38, 43 L. ed. 606, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 352; Saxlehner v. Eisner & M. Co. 179 U. S. 19, 45 L. ed. 60, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7; Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 481, 497, 5 L. ed. 311, 315; McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828; Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, 32 L. ed. 526, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143), we find but little evidence of such purpose in this record. The two waters not only differ in their ingredients and taste, but the French Vichy is a still, and the Saratoga Vichy, as well as the other American Vichies, an effervescing, water. There is no attempt made whatever by the defendant to simulate the *label of the plaintiffs upon the [440] body of the bottle. The word "Vichy" is never used by the defendant alone, but always in connection with Saratoga. The two labels not only differ wholly in their design and contents, but even in their language,—that of the plaintiffs being wholly in French. Plaintiffs' label contains the word "Vichy" prominently displayed, with a picture of the thermal establishment where it is bottled, and the name of the particular spring. Defendant's label contains the two words, "Saratoga Vichy," in type of the same size, and displayed with equal prominence, and a statement that the Saratoga Vichy is far superior to the imported Vichy. It is true that in 1896 a small label was attached to the neck of the bottle upon which the name "Vichy" was more prominent than that of

"Saratoga." This label was printed upon a white background, with the word "Vichy" in prominent red letters, while the word Saratoga appeared in much smaller black letters included between the extended "V" and "Y" of the word "Vichy." The circuit court considered this to be immaterial, and thought it inconceivable that anyone of ordinary perception could be induced to buy this water as the imported Vichy. A majority of the court of appeals, however, while agreeing with the circuit court as to the total dissimilarity of the main labels, thought a purchaser might be deceived by the neck label into buying the Saratoga for the imported article, and in that particular reversed the circuit court, and enjoined the use of the neck label, or of any other label in which the place of the origin of the water was not as plainly and as prominently made known as the word "Vichy." As the defendant did not apply for a certiorari, and has acquiesced in the decree of the circuit court of appeals by changing the offending label, we are not called upon to express an opinion as to the deceptive character of this label. Hubbard v. Tod, 171 U. S. 474, 43 L. ed. 246, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 14.

It was said by this court in Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. 322, 20 L. ed. 583, "In all cases where rights to the exclusive use of a trade-mark are invaded, it is invariably held that the essence of the wrong consists in the sale of the goods of one manufacturer or vendor *as those of another; and that it is only when this false representation is directly or indirectly made that the party who appeals to a court of equity can have relief." Applying this doctrine to the case under consideration we are clearly of the opinion that there is no such similarity in the labels as at present used, and that there is no such fraud shown in the conduct of the defendant, as would authorize us to say that plaintiffs are entitled to relief.

The decree of the Court of Appeals is therefore affirmed.

116, § 52, upon all those "engaged in the business of selling" sewing machines in the state, is an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce so far as applied to the sale of a single machine shipped into the state by a nonresident manufacturing corporation, upon the written order of a customer, under an ordinary C. O. D. consignment.

Argued November 12, 1903. Decided December 7, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of North Carolina, to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Superior Court of Person County in that state, enforcing a license tax for selling a sewing machine in the state. Reversed, and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 130 N. C. 556, 41 S. E. 673.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a controversy between the sheriff of Person county, North Carolina, on the one part, and the railway company and Mrs. O. L. Satterfield on the other, which might have been the subject of a civil action, and which the parties agreed to submit, under the Code of North Carolina, to the judge of the superior court upon the following facts, and upon the question of the liability of the defendants for a license tax under § 52 of "An Act to Raise Revenue," ratified March 15, 1901. *(Laws of 1901, p. 116.) The material part of the section reads as follows: [442]

"Every manufacturer of sewing machines, and every person or persons or corporation engaged in the business of selling the same in this state, shall, before selling or offering for sale any such machine, pay to the state treasurer, a tax of $350, and obtain a license, which shall operate for one year from the date of the issue."

The Norfolk & Western Railway Company, a Virginia corporation, operates a railroad from its main line at Lynchburg, Virginia, via Roxboro in Person county, North Carolina, to Durham in the same state. This company had itself complied with the revenue act of 1901, and paid a license tax for the privilege of carrying on its business as a common carrier within the state of North Carolina.

Sears, Roebuck, & Company (incorporated), of the city of Chicago, are manufacturers and dealers in sewing machines at Chicago, Illinois.

The defendant, Mrs. Satterfield, a resident of Person county, N. C., about November 1, U. S. 229; Harmon v. Chicago, 37 L. ed. U. S. 216; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 38 L. ed. U. S. 1041; and Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Adams, 39 L. ed. U. S. 311.

On license taxes as affecting interstate com-

1901, sent an order by mail to Sears, Roebuck, & Co. for a sewing machine, which was shipped by them as railroad freight from Chicago to Mrs. Satterfield at Roxboro, the railway company at Chicago issuing, on behalf of itself and its connecting railroad lines, a through bill of lading therefor, under which the sewing machine was to be delivered to Mrs. Satterfield on surrender of the bill of lading, and payment of freight charges to the delivering carrier, the Norfolk & Western Railway Co.

The bill of lading was sent by Sears, Roebuck, & Co. by express, C. O. D., to the express agent at Roxboro, who received from Mrs. Satterfield the price of the sewing machine, and delivered the bill of lading to her. The express agent and the railway station agent were one and the same person. Mrs. Satterfield, having paid the purchase price, presented the bill of lading to the station agent, tendered the freight charges, and demanded the delivery of the sewing machine.

[443] *The railway company was willing and would have delivered the same had not the plaintiff, the sheriff and ex officio tax collector of Person county, insisted that Sears, Roebuck, & Co. could not sell the machine to Mrs. Satterfield without paying the license tax of $350, and forbade the delivery of the machine until the tax was paid, and thereupon levied upon the machine for such tax. He also insisted that the railway company would, by delivering the machine, be acting as the agent of Sears, Roebuck, & Co., and would be liable to prosecution for misdemeanor in aiding and abetting them in an unlawful sale of the sewing machine.

It also appears in the agreed statement of facts that other machines were sent by the same consignors to various purchasers in North Carolina, upon the lines of other interstate railroads, and were delivered upon the presentation of other bills of lading under the same conditions as above described.

The court found that Sears, Roebuck, & Co. were indebted to the state for $350 license tax; that the levy upon the machine was lawful and valid, and plaintiff was ordered to sell the machine and apply the proceeds to the payment of the tax. The judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of the state. 130 N. C. 556, 41 S. E. 673.

Messrs. Theodore W. Reath and William A. Guthrie argued the cause, and, with Mr. Jos. I. Doran, filed a brief for plaintiffs in error:

The sale of a sewing machine by a citizen of Illinois to a citizen of North Carolina upon a mail order, the order being received in Illinois and the machine being sent from Illinois to North Carolina C. O. D., is commerce among the several states, which cannot be regulated or taxed by the states.

Messrs. Robert D. Gilmer and James E. Shepherd argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

The railroad and express agents concerned in all of these transactions were the agents of the Chicago company, and it was only through them as such agents that a complete sale of machines was effected.

Tiedeman, Sales, §§ 87, 95; Dows v. National Exch. Bank, 91 U. S. 631, 23 L. ed. 218.

The case of O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 324, 36 L. ed. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, is decisive of the one at bar upon this, and also upon the question of interstate commerce.

The carrier's duty has been performed, and it holds the machines in its warehouse as the agent of the Chicago company, and such agency concerns, alone, the completion of a sale by the receipt of the purchase money and delivery. It has nothing whatever to do with the carriage of the goods,

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

To the ordinary mind it seems a somewhat startling proposition that a manufacturing corporation, located and doing its main business in a distant city, having no manufactory in North Carolina, no stock in trade, no place for the sale of its goods there, and no agent authorized to sell them, can be compelled to take out a license required of all those "engaged in the business of selling," from the mere fact that it had done what hundreds of others were doing daily,—sent a single machine there upon a written order of a customer, and under an ordinary C. O. D. consignment. If this may be done, the revenues of every state may be largely increased by adopting a similar system, since a large part of the business of retail shops in the principal cities is done by orders received, filled, and the goods delivered in the same way. Of course, it is impossible to estimate the number of business houses in other states which are accustomed to collect their accounts in this manner.

If this were the law it would also follow that the consignor of every cargo of wheat sent to New York for export under a bill of lading, accompanied by a draft for the payment of the money in the usual method, might be compelled to take out a license in the state of New York as a dealer in produce, notwithstanding that all the real business was done in Chicago or North Dakota.

So, too, what the state may do directly it may authorize its municipalities to do, and if, under legislative sanction, each of the large towns in the state of North Carolina [447] saw fit to adopt a similar license tax, the consequence would be, not a simple interference with interstate commerce, but a practical destruction of one important branch of it.

While it may be entirely true that the property in the thing sold does not pass under a C. O. D. consignment until delivery of the goods and payment to the carrier, and hence it may be said that the sale is not completed until then, yet, as matter of fact, the bargain is made, and the contract of sale completed as such, when the order is received in Chicago, and the machine shipped in pursuance thereof.

A sale really consists of two separate and distinct elements: first, a contract of sale, which is completed when the offer is made and accepted; and, second, a delivery of the property which may precede, be accompanied by, or follow the payment of the price, as may have been agreed upon between the parties. The substance of the sale is the agreement to sell, and its acceptance. That possession shall be retained until payment of the price may or may not have been a part of the original bargain, but in substance it is a mere method of collection, and we have never understood that a license could be imposed upon this transaction except in connection with the prior agreement to sell, although, in certain cases arising under the police power, it has been held that the sale is not complete until delivery, and sometimes not until payment. Were it not for the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina, we should have said that the words "engaged in the business of selling the same within the state" had reference to the word "selling" in its popular and ordinary sense of selling from a stock on hand or upon a special order to a manufacturer, and not to a mere method of collecting the money; but, however this may be, it is evident the state courts could not give it a construction which would operate as an interference with interstate commerce, and that upon this question the opinion of this court is controlling.

The cases relied upon by the state do not support its contention. In Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, a Connecticut *corporation, manufacturing sewing machines at Bridgeport, had an agency at Nashville, Tennessee, from which an agent was sent out to sell machines. It was held that he was subject to a license tax upon "all peddlers of sewing machines, without regard to the place of growth or produce of material or manufacture." As it appeared that the sale was made, and wholly made, in the state of Tennessee, and apparently from a stock kept in that state, through an agent of the company, the case is not in point. This case was followed, upon a similar state of facts in Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 68, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367.

The case most earnestly pressed upon attention, however, is that of O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 36 L. ed. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693. This was a prosecution before a justice of the peace for selling, furnishing, and giving away intoxicating liquors. The defendant was a dealer in liquors at Whitehall, New York, and was in the habit of receiving at his store orders for liquors from Vermont, accompanied by a jug to contain the liquor; and the liquors, as in this case, were sent under a C. O. D. consignment.

It was held by this court that, as the only question considered by the Supreme Court in its opinion was whether the liquor was sold by O'Neil at Rutland or at Whitehall, and the court arrived at the conclusion that the completed sale was in Vermont, that this conclusion did not involve any Federal question, and the writ of error was dismissed. Mr. Justice Blatchford took express pains to say that "no point on the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States was taken in the county court, . . . or considered by the supreme court of Vermont." The case was put by the supreme court of the state solely upon its police power. "If," said that court, "an express company or any other carrier or person, natural or corporate, has in possession within this state an article in itself dangerous to the community, or an article intended for unlawful or criminal use within the state, it is a necessary incident of the police powers of the state that such article should be subject to seizure for the protection of the community."

[449] *It will thus be seen that the supreme court of Vermont disclaimed the decision of the very question involved in this case as to the power of the states to interfere with interstate commerce by taxation of the thing imported, and the writ of error was dismissed upon the ground that no Federal question was presented for its decision, and none was necessary to the determination of the case. Mr. Justice Field, in his dissenting opinion, thought the commerce clause of the Constitution was involved, and that the transaction was a clear interference with commerce between the states.

Upon the other hand, for the past seventy-five years, and ever since the original case of Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, we have uniformly held that states have no power to tax directly, or by license upon the importer, goods imported from foreign countries or other states, while in their original packages, or before they have become commingled with the general property of the state, and lost their distinctive character as imports. In that case a law of Maryland required importers to take out a license before they could be permitted to sell their imported goods. That was declared to be void not only as a tax upon imports, but as an infringement upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce. The case is one of the most important ever decided by this court, and has been adhered to by a uniform series of decisions since that time.

In Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, it was declared that a tax upon commercial agents not having a business house in the state was unconstitutional as a regulation of commerce when applied to soliciting the sale of goods on behalf of individuals or firms doing business in another state, Mr. Justice Bradley remarking, apropos of what was subsequently decided in O'Neil v. Vermont, "that the only way in which commerce between the states can be legitimately affected by state laws is when, by virtue of its police power, and its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a state provides for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons and the protection of property; or, when it does those *things[450] which may otherwise incidentally affect commerce, such as . . . the imposition of taxes upon all property within the state, mingled with and forming part of the great mass of property therein. But in making such internal regulations a state cannot impose taxes . . . upon property imported into the state from abroad, or from another state, and not yet become part of the common mass of property therein, . . . and no regulations can be made directly affecting interstate commerce." This case was affirmed in Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 368, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

The same rule was applied in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, and Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454, to a statute requiring the payment of a license from persons dealing in merchandise not the growth, produce, or manufacture of the state, and requiring no such license from persons selling goods grown, produced, or manufactured within the state. In McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 391, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 181, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881, a license tax imposed upon the agent of a railroad between Chicago and New York, soliciting business in San Francisco, was held to be void. To the same effect are Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851; Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 38 L. ed. 719, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 658, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829, and Stockard v. Morgan, 185 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 785, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576. Finally, in Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. 336, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229, another of the same line of cases, it was held that a city ordinance imposing a license upon every person engaged in the business of selling or delivering picture frames, etc., was an interference with interstate commerce, so far as applied to picture frames made in other states, and shipped to an agent in the state of North Carolina; and that the transaction was not taken out of the protection of the commerce clause by the fact that the agent placed the pictures in their proper frames, and delivered them to the persons ordering them. Most of the prior cases are noticed in this opinion.

Indeed, the cases upon this subject are almost too numerous for citation, and the one under consideration is clearly controlled by them. The sewing machine was made and sold in another state, shipped to North Carolina in its original package *for delivery to the consignee upon payment of its price. It had never become commingled with the general mass of property within the state. While technically the title of the machine may not have passed until the price was paid, the sale was actually made in Chicago, and the fact that the price was to be collected in North Carolina is too slender a thread upon which to hang an exemption of the transaction from a rule which would otherwise declare the tax to be an interference with interstate commerce.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of North Carolina is therefore reversed and the case remanded to that court for further proceeding not inconsistent with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Holmes did not participate in the decision of this case.

Usury by national bank—Federal law governs.

A controversy respecting usurious interest paid on a note held by a national bank, secured by collateral note and mortgage, which arises in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, is none the less governed by the Federal law on the subject of usury by national banks, as expressed in U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5198 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3493), affording the remedy of an independent action to recover back the usurious payments, because the collateral note and mortgage were executed in favor of the bank president for the benefit of the bank, which was prohibited by the Federal law from taking real estate security for a debt coincidentally contracted.

which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of Dodge County of that State, allowing a recovery by way of set-off of usurious interest paid to a national bank. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 63 Neb. 881, 89 N. W. 403.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

*On August 8, 1890, George Thrush, one of the defendants in error, being indebted to the Schuyler National Bank, one of the plaintiffs in error, for money then and theretofore lent, executed a note to the bank for the sum of $5,000, payable six months after date. As collateral security for the payment of this note, Thrush and his wife executed a note and mortgage for $5,000 to one Sumner, who was at that time the president of the bank. The collateral note and mortgage were delivered to the bank, and by it retained. The note made to the bank was renewed by the bank from time to time, and various payments of interest and on account of the principal were made to the bank, the principal sum thereby being reduced in March, 1894, to $3,000. In that month and year a new note was executed to the bank for the principal sum then due and interest, in all, $3,229. No money dealings were had at any time between either Thrush and his wife and Sumner individually.

James Gadsden, one of the defendants in error sued Thrush and his wife in a Nebraska court to foreclose an asserted mortgage on real estate. Junior encumbrances of record were made parties defendant, among them being Sumner, to whom the mortgage for $5,000, securing the collateral note previously referred to, had been executed. He answered and by cross petition asserted the lien of the mortgage, which he alleged was made to him as trustee, for the benefit of the Schuyler National Bank; he prayed foreclosure of such lien, and the payment of the indebtedness to the bank, stated to be $3,229 and interest. The Schuyler National Bank was subsequently made a party defendant; and, by answer and cross petition, claimed the benefit of the mortgage to Sumner, securing the indebtedness just stated, and joined in the prayer for foreclosure. Separate answers, similar in tenor, were filed on behalf of Thrush and his wife, in which were averred, in numerous paragraphs, many payments to the bank of usurious interest during a period of five years, and in substance it was prayed that the amount of such payments might be deducted *from the principal sum claimed by the bank to be due. In each of the answers was contained the following paragraph:

"That the said note of $5,000 of the defendants George Thrush and Mattie N.

Thrush, together with the mortgage securing the same, were not executed and delivered to said William H. Sumner upon any consideration whatsoever, but the same are simply held by said defendant as collateral security to the amount owing by the defendant, George Thrush, on the said indebtedness now being evidenced by said $3,229 note, in this: that the said note of $5,000 and the mortgage securing the same were executed and delivered by this defendant and Mattie N. Thrush to said Sumner for the purpose that said Sumner might protect therewith said bank on account of the indebtedness of said George Thrush to said bank, and said note and mortgage were accepted by said Sumner with the knowledge and consent of said bank, and because said bank refused to take said mortgage, and said Sumner in no wise protected said loan or advanced any money thereon and at the time of the maturity thereof, by virtue of the premises and the payments of usurious and illegal interest made thereon, as aforesaid, there was due and owing, after deducting the payments made upon the principal and the said payments of usurious interest, the small balance, to wit, of $252.20, and for the aforesaid balance the said defendant Sumner is entitled to a lien upon said premises under and by virtue of said mortgage and promissory note of $5,000."

A reply was filed to these answers. It was therein stated in substance that most of the alleged usurious interest had been paid to the bank more than two years before the commencement of the action, and that the remaining interest payments were not in excess of the rate allowed by law to be contracted for. The pleading concluded with the claim "that this court has no jurisdiction in this action to consider the question raised in said answer to each and every item of interest mentioned in said answer as paid to said Schuyler National Bank; that said items are not proper items of set-off or counter claim and cannot *be adjudicated except in a suit brought expressly for that purpose under the provisions of § 5198 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3493)."

[454] A decree was entered determining the priority of liens between the respective lienholders, and providing for a foreclosure. Among other things it was adjudged that the mortgage to Sumner was executed and delivered for the benefit of the bank, and that the bank was entitled to the proceeds of the note and mortgage. As to the defense of usury set up in the answers, it was decided that, as the transaction was one with a national bank, it was governed by the laws of the United States, and, therefore, recovery by way of set-off of the usurious interest alleged to have been paid was refused. Recovery of the interest embraced in the claim of the bank was, however, denied, and judgment was entered only for the principal sum found to be due and owing to the bank.

On appeal, the supreme court of Nebraska reversed the judgment of the district court in the particular just noticed, and remanded the cause with directions "to ascertain the amount of money advanced to Thrush by the Schuyler National Bank, deduct therefrom all payments, whether of principal or interest, and award foreclosure for the remainder, if any." 56 Neb. 565, 76 N. W. 1060. On a rehearing, the appellate court reaffirmed its previous decision. 58 Neb. 340, 45 L. R. A. 654, 78 N. W. 632. Thereupon a writ of error was allowed from this court, which was subsequently dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 179 U. S. 681, 45 L. ed. 384, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 918. Subsequently the state district court entered a judgment in conformity with the mandate of the supreme court of Nebraska, and such judgment was affirmed on appeal. 63 Neb. 881, 89 N. W. 403. The present writ of error was thereupon allowed.

Mr. Charles J. Phelps argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Haseltine v. Central Nat. Bank, 183 U. S. 130, 46 L. ed. 117, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 49.

George Thrush and Mattie N. Thrush in propriis personis submitted the cause for defendants in error. Messrs. George H. Thomas and Frank Dolezal were on their brief.

Mr. Justice White, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for decision is, Did the supreme court of Nebraska rightly decide that the controversy concerning usurious interest paid was to be governed by the statutes of Nebraska on that subject, and not by the laws of the United States on the same subject, as expressed in § 5198 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3493)? We say this is the sole question, because it is undoubted that if the rights of the parties are to be determined by the laws of the United States, the ruling below was wrong. This results from the prior adjudications of this court, holding that where usurious interest has been paid to a national bank, the remedy afforded by § 5198 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3493), is exclusive, and is confined to an independent action to recover such usurious payments. Haseltine v. Central Nat. Bank, 183 U. S. 132, 46 L. ed. 118, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, and cases cited. If, on the other hand, the controversy is governed by the local law of Nebraska, then the construction and application of that law made by the court of last resort of the state is binding.

In fact, this is not controverted and could not be since the supreme court of Nebraska conceded that if the contention as to usurious interest ought to be determined by the laws of the United States, the conclusion which the court reached was erroneous. That court, however, held that the rights of the parties were to be measured by the law of the state instead of the law of the United States, because the collateral mortgage was not made, eo nomine, to the bank, but to an individual. This view was deemed to be fortified by the suggestion that, as the collateral note was secured by mortgage on [457] real estate, *it could not, under the laws of the United States, have been lawfully made in favor of a national bank. The collateral note and mortgage, it was, therefore, intimated, must be assumed to have been executed to an individual to avoid the effect of the laws of the United States, and the consequent knowledge which would have been conveyed to the proper officers of the United States that the bank was violating the law.

The reasoning by which the judgment of the supreme court of Nebraska was controlled is, in our opinion, erroneous. The court did not hold that; because the collateral mortgage was taken in the name of an individual, it could not be enforced by the bank under the law of Nebraska, but simply held that, although it was enforceable by the bank, the remedy as to the usurious interest was governed exclusively by the state law, upon the theory that the transaction was not with the bank. But the usurious interest had all been paid, not to the individual upon the collateral note, but to the bank, upon the principal obligation held by it. It was this interest so paid to the bank on the principal note held by it which was in effect imputed so as to fix the amount due. The result of this was to treat the transaction as an individual one in order thereby to exclude the law of the United States, and then at once to treat it as a bank transaction for the purpose of ascertaining and imputing the sums of usurious interest which had been paid. This was to administer the rights of the parties upon distinct and wholly inconsistent theories. Either it was an individual transaction or it was not. It could not in reason have been at one and the same time both the transaction of the bank excluding the individual and a dealing between individuals excluding the bank. As the usurious interest for which a remedy was afforded had been paid to the bank in dealings by the bank with its debtor, and as the necessary effect of the judgment below was to reduce the debt due to the bank by allowing the imputation of the sum of the usurious interest, we are of opinion that the controversy was governed by the laws of the United States, and not by the law of the state of Nebraska.

*Nor do we think the suggestions made in [458] the opinion of the court below respecting the power of a national bank under the laws of the United States to accept real estate security operate in any way to modify the conclusion we have just expressed. It is not contended that under the law of Nebraska an agent, acting in his own name, may not take security for the benefit of a principal, or that there is or could be any valid statute of the state of Nebraska discriminating against national banks, and depriving them of the benefit of transactions so consummated. This being true it follows that the taking of real estate security by the president of the bank in his individual name, for the benefit of the bank, was in legal effect but the taking of security by the bank itself. Now it is no longer open to controversy that the provisions of the statutes of the United States forbidding the taking of real-estate security by a national bank for a debt coincidentally contracted do not operate to make the security void, and thus enable the individual who has contracted with the bank to defeat recovery, but simply subjects the bank to be called to account by the government for exceeding its powers. In Logan County Nat. Bank v. Townsend, 139 U. S. 67, 35 L. ed. 107, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 496, the rule on this subject, as settled by the previous authorities, was thus stated by the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan (p. 76, L. ed. p. 111, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 499):

"In Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188, it appeared that a national bank loaned money upon the security of a note and a deed of trust of lands, both of which were assigned to it. The statute declared that a national banking association could loan money 'on personal security,' and could purchase, hold, and convey real estate for certain named purposes, 'and for no others,' among which was not included the securing of a present loan of money by a deed of trust or mortgage on real property. The court, while assuming that the statute, by clear implication forbade the bank from making a loan on real estate, refused to restrain the bank from enforcing the deed of trust. The decision went upon these grounds: That the bank parted with its money in good faith; that the question as [459] to the violation *of its charter by taking title to real estate for purposes unauthorized by law could be raised only by the government in a direct proceeding for that purpose; and that it was not open to the plaintiff in that suit, who had contracted with the bank, to raise any such question in order to defeat the collection of the amount loaned. If any doubt existed as to the scope of the decision in that case, it was removed by National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443, where it was held that the right of a national bank to enforce a mortgage of real estate taken by it to secure indebtedness then existing, as well as future advances, could not be questioned by the debtor, and that a disregard by the bank of the provisions of the act of Congress upon that subject only laid the association open to proceedings by the government for exercising powers not conferred by law."

It follows from the foregoing reasons that the supreme court of Nebraska erroneously determined the rights of the parties by the rule of the state law, when it should have applied the law of the United States.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Nebraska is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Brown, with whom was Mr. Justice Brewer, dissenting:

I am constrained to dissent from the opinion of the court in this case.

The facts, concisely stated, are as follows: George Thrush executed a note to the bank for $5,000, payable in six months. At the same time Thrush and wife executed a collateral note and mortgage for the same amount to Sumner, president of the bank. This note and mortgage, given partly for an antecedent and partly for a contemporaneous debt, were delivered to the bank, and retained by it.

The note made to the bank was renewed from time to time, *and various payments of [460] interest and principal were made, and the principal sum thereby reduced, in March, 1894, to $3,000. At that time a new note was executed to the bank for the principal sum due and interest, namely, $3,229. No dealings were had at any time between Thrush and wife and Sumner individually.

Suit having been begun by Gadsden to foreclose a prior mortgage, and Sumner having been made a party as junior encumbrancer, he answered, and by cross petition asserted the lien of the mortgage, which he alleged was made to him as trustee of the bank. The bank being also made defendant, filed an answer and cross petition, claiming the benefit of the mortgage to Sumner.

It is clear that there was but one actual debt. The question is, whether, in asserting its right to foreclose the mortgage made to Sumner individually, it must not submit itself to the laws of the state affecting usury; in other words, whether, in the foreclosure of a mortgage created under the laws of a state, and executed by one citizen of a state to another, its obligations are to be determined by state law or Federal law. Congress forbids such a mortgage; the state permits it. There can be no doubt that the bank caused the mortgage to be given to Sumner on account of the law forbidding national banks from receiving security by way of mortgage upon real estate, and to obviate any difficulties which might be interposed either by the mortgagor or by the government, by taking the mortgage in the name of the bank.

Had the mortgage expressed upon its face the exact truth, namely, that it was given for the benefit of a national bank, and partly, at least, for the security of a contemporaneous debt, it would have fallen within the ban of the Federal statute. It is true the state law permitted it, but accompanied it with a forfeiture of the entire interest if usury were taken. The question is whether, in enforcing this mortgage, which the bank was prohibited from taking in its own name, it may claim an exemption from the usury laws of the state. So long as the [461]*dealings were solely between the bank and Thrush, and payments were made upon the bank note in question, the transaction with regard to usury was governed by the Federal law. But in case the bank elected to foreclose the mortgage, I think it took the benefit of it cum onere. He who seeks equity must do equity. It could not take the benefit of the mortgage to Sumner, and claim a right to foreclose for the amount due, without, at the same time, admitting that the payments which had been made were made upon a debt secured by the mortgage, and subject to the disability of the state law. As was justly said by the supreme court of Nebraska: "It would be highly unconscionable to permit a person to give a contract a false form to evade the burdens which would follow from its true expression, and then permit him to show the truth as against the form to evade the burdens cast by a contract in the form which has been so chosen." [56 Neb. 565, 76 N. W. 1060.] The bank ought not to be permitted to blow hot and cold in the same transaction. If it claimed the benefit of a mortgage made to an individual, it should take it with such burdens as would rest upon it if the transaction had originally been what it was represented to be upon its face. The opinion of the court suggests an easy method by which the prohibition of the Federal statute against the lending of money upon real estate security may be successfully evaded without the slightest danger to the bank.

v.

CATHARINE LANDRIGAN, Administratrix of the Estate of Thomas J. Landri-gan, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 461-477.)

Negligence—presumption of caution—instruction as to railway gates—province of court and jury.

1. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, there is a presumption that a pedestrian, before attempting to cross railroad tracks, stopped, looked, and listened.

2. An instruction as to the effect of closed gates at a railway crossing as a notice of danger to a person attempting to cross the tracks is not erroneous, where it tells the jury that if the gates were generally kept down at night without regard to the presence or absence of passing trains, and the pedestrian had knowledge of that fact, then the circumstance that the gates were down when he was run over in attempting to cross the tracks at night was not of itself a warning to him of the presence of danger, and that contributory negligence could not be imputed to him from that fact alone.
3. The issue whether a person attempting to cross railway tracks was struck by a runaway car or an express train is properly submitted to the jury, where there was evidence on the issue from which reasonable men might draw different conclusions.

Argued November 10, 11, 1903. Decided December 7, 1903:

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court of the District in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for a death alleged to be due to negligence. Affirmed.

See same case below, 20 App. D. C. 135.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

This action was brought under the death statute of the District of Columbia for damages for the death of the husband and intestate of defendant in error. The death was the result of injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the plaintiffs in error. The negligence is alleged to have consisted in the insufficient coupling of the cars of the plaintiffs in error, whereby one broke loose from the others and ran over the deceased; in not equipping the car with good brakes; and not having upon it a light sufficient to give warning of its approach. The answer was not guilty.

The case was tried to a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the defendant in error in the sum of $6,500. This amount was agreed to as correct if the jury should find on the other issues for the defendant in error.

Judgment was entered for that amount and costs. It was affirmed on appeal to the court of appeals of the District.

The testimony is somewhat long, and we think it is only necessary to give an outline of what it tended to prove to illustrate and determine the questions presented.

The plaintiffs in error operated a steam railroad in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and maintained four tracks on Virginia avenue southwest, crossing South Capitol street. The most northerly of the tracks, called "The Reservation" or "No. 1" track, was used for freight and shifting purposes. The two intermediate tracks were used for south bound and north bound passenger traffic. The most southerly track was called the "ladder" or "lead track." It [463] was so called because all the tracks in the railroad yard were connected with it, and all the switches lead into it. It extended west across South Capitol street to an alley, and terminated at what was known as the property yard, where coal, ties, iron, and other commodities were stored. Gates and a gateman were maintained at the crossing. There was evidence tending to show that the portion of this track lying west of the crossing was used for storing freight cars, but not passenger coaches, and that no portion lying west was used for shifting or making up the trains; but there was also evidence tending to show that it was so used as occasion required. Landrigan's body was found at the southwest crossing, south of the "lead track," "but nearer the track than the gate," and there was flesh and blood alongside of the track upon its south side. There was also testimony tending to show that the gates were generally kept down (one witness testified that, in his experience, they were always down) from 10 or 11 o'clock at night until next morning, whether trains were passing or not, and persons with vehicles sometimes found it necessary to request the gateman to raise the gates, and sometimes to wake him up out of sleep for that purpose. Preceding and at the time of the accident a switching crew was making up a train of cars for the transportation of troops to the south, and it became necessary to "cut out" a Pullman ear, called the "Lylete," which was standing on one of the tracks. Immediately next to it was a tourist ear. It was equipped with a Miller coupler; the Pullman with a Janney coupler. Both couplers were of the automatic type, but of different patterns, and not designed to couple together, and in order to draw the ears out on the "ladder" track they were coupled together with the ordinary link and pin coupling.

There was considerable testimony as to the manner in which the coupling was done, and of its efficiency, which testimony it is not necessary to detail. It went to the jury with the other testimony. It is enough to say that the couplers were of unequal height, and the link could not be put in the slot of both couplers. It was put in the slot [464] of the Janney coupler, and the other end laid on the top of the Miller coupler, "and the only thing to keep the link from slipping over the head of the pin was a shoulder around the head of the pin." It came loose, and one of the employees, who had been in charge of the train, testified that "the couplings 'slipped around,' he supposed, when they were going around the curve, and that had the tendency to make them come apart; that he supposed it was due to the slack caused by coming over the switch and 'the ladder' track." The "ladder" track had a slight incline to the crossing, and when the ear broke loose it started towards the crossing. An employee had tried the brake on the straight track, but when some one "hollered" that the ear had broken off, he "went to work on the brake again." "It did not then 'dropped off the end of the ear and seem to catch hold," he testified; and he caught the rear end of it—the head end—and at the same time Hottel (yardmaster) got on the end that he got off of; the witness called for Wilber to help him to put the brake on, and they did all they could to stop the ear, but the ear had got too much start; the brake seemed to work all right—he did not have any fault to find with the brake, only the ear had gotten too much start; he first tried the rear brake and could not get that to work; then went to the other one; while witness and Wilber were working on the forward brake Hottel jumped on and tried to work the rear brake; they did not succeed in stopping the ear, because it had gotten too much of a start. He got off at South Capitol street on the southeast side, stood there for a second or two, and then ran after the ear to see what damage it had done. There were some other ears down on the end of this track, that this ear ran into, and it would not have been safe for the witness to have stayed on the ear."

The witness testified that he "did not know Landrigan personally; had seen him a number of times; he saw him after he was hurt; Landrigan's legs were run over, but he could not say whether it was by the ear or another train; train No. 78, which left the [465] depot about 11:55 or 11:35, was passing there about the time of the accident; this train No. 78 is known as the midnight express for New York, and crossed South Capitol street, where Landrigan was hurt, going in an easterly direction; when witness saw Landrigan the latter was lying on the south side of the outside rail of the 'ladder track,' the most southerly track of the four tracks of the crossing; immediately before he saw Landrigan lying there the coach 'Lylete' passed over the crossing at South Capitol street and witness came right along behind this car, after train 78 passed, to see if the coach had done any damage down there, and saw Landrigan lying there with some one around him; he went down where the car had stopped and came back and found out what the trouble was." As to the position of the gates, he said: "He first noticed the gates when he came down there after he had jumped off the end of the car; the gates were down then on both sides of the street. He did not notice the gates before 78 passed, stood on the southeast side of South Capitol street until 78 passed, and then started to run down the main track, and as he ran down the track he noticed that the gates were down on both sides." And further, "the runaway car passed the southwest crossing of South Capitol street before No. 78 reached there; it struck just the middle part of No. 78 as the train came by there; because he had not been down that far; he the runaway car had just about gotten across the crossing when the engine of No. 78 began to cross the crossing; it was almost at the same time."

There was a white light in the dome of the vestibule of the runaway car or on the platform, and the effect of the light was testified to as follows by one witness:

"The lamp in the dome of the vestibule of the Pullman car had a white shade or globe underneath; it gave a bright light,—you could see it all right; the lamp was inside of the door, and the door was closed; the glass in the door extended about half way down, and the light shone through the glass in the door."

[466] *By another witness:

"That the light in the car was in the dome,—in the vestibule,—just on the outside of the door, over the platform; he knows there was a light in the west end of the car, the end going toward South Capitol street,—which was the front end of the car the way it was moving; this light could be seen more plainly than a lamp; such lights contain two burners, are lighted by oil, and are more brilliant than a lantern; the reflector is over the top of the light; there is a kind of white shade over them; that the light in the vestibule of the car could be seen by people on the ground; it hung down low, and did not set right up in the dome; it had a shade over it, but he does not know whether you could call it a reflector or not; it was plain enough to be seen by anybody who was on the ground."

By another witness:

"That the light in the vestibule of a Pullman car is so located as to illuminate the platform only; that is the purpose of that light; that it does not throw the light more than a couple of feet beyond the end of the bumper of the car; it is not intended to illuminate the track.

"And thereupon, on cross-examination, said witness further testified that such a light was not intended for a locomotive headlight; that if a man was standing on the track some distance from the advancing end of a car showing such a light he would not see the source of the light, but would see the reflected light on the platform on the car; he could see the illuminated end of the car; that if he was not looking exactly in that direction this light would not attract his attention away from something else; that if he were looking up the track he could see the light if he were not too far away."

And the evidence showed "that a Pullman car running along an ordinarily straight track at a rate of speed a little faster than a man ordinarily runs, or can run, does not make any noise."

Landrigan was employed as a machinist and assistant boss on the night force at the round house, which was situated between *H[467] and I streets, on South Capitol street. He had been employed for eight years. His home was north of the railroad tracks on Virginia avenue, and the most usual and direct route to his home from the round house was up South Capitol street to the southwest crossing, "then right over to the north side of Virginia avenue; and it was the way Landrigan usually took." On the night of the accident he left the round house about 11:50 o'clock, and about twelve o'clock was found in the place and condition described in the testimony. The night "was not a clear night, nor was it a real dark night,—there was no moon and there were a few clouds." The crossing was lighted up by street lamps located on each side of the four corners, and there was an electric light in the reservation north of the tracks, and another one south and east of the tracks near the signal tower.

There was testimony to the effect that to a person outside of the gate the flagman's box would "obstruct the view of the ladder track to the east, but one standing on the inside of the gate on the open space, you could look straight up the track to the eastward, and there was nothing to break your view." And also that two freight cars obstructed the view to the west.

There was no eyewitness to the accident, and Landrigan, in response to the inquiry, "How did this thing happen?" replied, "I came under the gates and something struck me, and a whole train of cars ran over me." He died about four o'clock without making further explanation.

At the close of the testimony the plaintiffs in error moved the court to instruct the jury to find a verdict for them. The court refused, and this is assigned as error. The case was then submitted on the evidence of the defendant in error.

Errors are also assigned upon the giving and refusing of certain instructions.

Messrs. J. Spalding Flannery and Frederic D. McKenney argued the cause, and, with Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, filed a brief for plaintiffs in error:

Messrs. J. J. Darlington and Charles A. Douglass argued the cause, and, with Mr. Joseph D. Wright, filed a brief for defendant in error:

Where there is a reasonable dispute as to the evidentiary facts tending to establish negligence, or as to the reasonable inferences which a jury might draw therefrom, the ultimate fact as to whether the party charged with negligence is guilty is for the jury; but, where the facts are undisputed, and the inferences therefrom all one way, the controversy turns upon the question of law that must be decided by the court.

Douglas v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 100 Wis. 407, 76 N. W. 356.

When a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may clearly differ upon the question as to whether there was negligence or not, the determination of the matter is for the jury. It is only where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from them that the question of negligence is ever considered as one of law for the court.

Assuming that the plaintiff either succeeded in establishing a custom to keep the gates closed, or that the testimony on that point was sufficient to go to the jury, then going under the gates, considering the facts of this case, was not negligence per se.

Dashiell v. Washington Market Co. 10 App. D. C. 81.

Those who are crossing a railroad track are bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence to ascertain whether a train is approaching. They have, indeed, the greater incentive to caution, for their lives are in imminent danger if collision happen; and hence it will not be presumed, without evidence, that they do not exercise proper care.

Continental Improv. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. ed. 403; Cowen v. Merriman, 17 App. D. C. 186; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gentry, 163 U. S. 353, 41 L. ed. 186, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1104.

A judge is not bound to charge upon assumed facts ipsissimis verbis of counsel, nor to give categorical answers to a judicial catechism based on such assumption. Such a course would often mislead the jury instead of enlightening them, and is calculated rather to involve the case in the meshes of technicality than to promote the ends of law and justice. It belongs to the judicial office to exercise discretion as to the style and form in which to expound the law and comment upon the facts.

Continental Improv. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. ed. 403.

The correctness of the ruling in denying the motion to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiffs in error depends upon the correctness of the ruling in granting or refusing the special instructions prayed. The principles embraced in them are but specifications of the legal propositions contained in the motion, and upon which its soundness or unsoundness depended. If the ruling of the court was right on those instructions it was right on denying the motion. We proceed, therefore, to the consideration of the propositions embraced in the instructions.

The charge of the defendant in error is that the railroad companies were guilty of negligence. The railroads deny this, and claim besides that the deceased came to his death by his own negligence, or by negligence which contributed to that result. As an element in the question of the entire innocence of the railroad companies, there is involved the construction and effect of the evidence in regard to the coupling of the cars, and the sufficiency of the light upon the Pullman car to give notice and warning of its approach. In regard, however, to that evidence, the instructions of the court are not questioned in this court. No error is assigned on them here, and whatever of argument is addressed to them or to the evidence is intended to show that those acts, even if they were acts of negligence, were not effective causes of the injury of the deceased, but that his own negligence was such cause. The determination of the contentions of plaintiffs in error, therefore, depends upon the question of the negligence of the deceased, and the instructions given in relation thereto. At the request of the plaintiff in the action, defendant in error here, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"1. In the absence of all evidence tending to show whether the plaintiff's intestate stopped, looked, and listened before attempting to cross the south track, the presumption would be that he did. But that presumption may be rebutted by circumstantial evidence, and it is a question for the jury whether the facts and circumstances proved in this case rebut that presumption, and if they find that they do, they should find that he did not stop and look and listen; but if the facts and circumstances fail to rebut such presumption, then the jury should find that he did so stop and look and listen. In order to justify them in finding that he did not, all the evidence tending to show that should be weightier in the minds of the jury than that tending to show the contrary.

"2. The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the gates at the crossing where the deceased received his injury were generally kept down at night from 10:30 or 11 o'clock until the early morning, without regard to the approach or presence of a car, a train or trains or locomotives, and shall further conclude from all the facts and circumstances of the case that the deceased had knowledge of that fact, then the circumstance that the gates at the intersection of South Capitol street were down at the time of the accident was not of itself a warning to him of the presence of danger, and contributory negligence cannot be imputed to him from that fact alone.

"3. While knowledge by the deceased of the presence of the Fenton engine on the north track or partly upon the South Capitol street crossing, and the approach of No. 78 upon one of the central tracks at or near the time of the accident, might or would indicate the presence of danger on or near those tracks, it is for the jury to determine upon all the facts of this case whether it was a want of ordinary or reasonable care and prudence upon his part to be upon the south track, at the point upon said last-named track at which they shall find from the evidence the accident occurred."

The defendants, plaintiffs in error here, submitted instructions to the court which were emphatic contraries of the instructions given at the request of the plaintiff, and expressed the law to be that the fact of the gates being down was of itself *a warning to [473] the deceased; and further, if he disregarded the warning, he was guilty of contributory negligence; and that the gates being down, they were "closed or lowered for all trains, cars, or engines which were moving or passing or which might move or pass upon all or any of said tracks at said crossing, and were a warning of danger which the plaintiff's intestate was bound to heed, and if the jury shall find that the plaintiff's intestate met his death by going under said gates and upon or so near to one of said tracks as to be struck by a car moving on said track, he was guilty of negligence contributing to the accident, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action."

The following instruction was also prayed:

"It appearing from the uncontradicted evidence in the case that the defendants maintained at all hours of the night a gate-man in charge of the gates at the crossing in question, who raised and lowered said gates as occasion might require, and it further appearing from such evidence that such gateman was accustomed to open or raise said gates for the passage of pedestrians or vehicles when it was safe to do so, and it further appearing that the crossing in question being adjacent to the shifting, storage, and engine yards of said defendants, and between such yards and their passenger and freight stations in the city of Washington, and that the main tracks leading to and from said station also passed over the same, said crossing was an especially dangerous place, the jury are instructed that, in the absence of any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's intestate, upon approaching said crossing, and finding the gates between him and the tracks lowered or closed, made any request of the gateman to raise or open the same, or submitted any inquiry as to whether any engines, cars, or trains were approaching said crossing before he went under said gates and entered upon the crossing within the same and thereby received the injuries which resulted in his death, said intestate was guilty of negligence directly contributing to his own misfortune and the plaintiff cannot recover."

[474] (1.) There was no error in instructing the jury that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, there was a presumption that the deceased stopped, looked, and listened. The law was so declared in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gentry, 163 U. S. 353, 366, 41 L. ed. 186, 192, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1104. The case was a natural extension of prior cases. The presumption is founded on a law of nature. We know of no more universal instinct than that of self-preservation,—none that so insistently urges to care against injury. It has its motives to exercise in the fear of pain, maiming, and death. There are few presumptions based on human feelings or experience that have surer foundation than that expressed in the instruction objected to. But, notwithstanding the incentives to the contrary, men are sometimes inattentive, careless, or reckless of danger. These the law does not excuse nor does it distinguish between the degrees of negligence.

This was the ruling in Northern P. R. Co. v. Freeman, 174 U. S. 379, 43 L. ed. 1014, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 763, the case which plaintiffs in error oppose to Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gentry. In the Freeman Case a man thirty-five years old, with no defect of eyesight or hearing, familiar with a railroad crossing, and driving gentle horses, which were accustomed to the cars, approached the crossing at a trot not faster than a brisk walk, with his head down, looking at his horses, and drove upon the track, looking "straight before him, without turning his head either way." This was testified to by witnesses. There was direct evidence, therefore, of inattention. There is no such evidence in this case, and the instructions given must be judged accordingly. The court did not tell the jury that all those who cross railroad tracks stop, look, and listen, or that the deceased did so, but that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, he was presumed to have done so, and it was left to the jury to say if there was such evidence. The instruction was a recognition of "the common experience of men," from which it was judged in the Freeman Case that the deceased in that case had not looked or listened, and submitted to the jury that which it was their constitutional duty to decide. And there was enough evidence to justify dispute, and from which different conclusions could be drawn.

* (2.) We think there was no error in the [475] instruction as to the effect of the gates as a notice of danger under the practice of the companies. Indeed, the instruction is so obviously right that argument advanced to support it drops into truisms. One thing or condition cannot be any certain evidence of another thing or condition unless they invariably coexist. Of course, two things may occasionally coexist, but this furnishes no argument for plaintiffs in error. It only raises the query, When do the things coexist? and, making an application to the pending case, When did the closed gates and passing trains coexist? When were the former a witness of the latter? Always? The testimony answers, no. Between 10:30 and 11 o'clock at night, until morning, the gates were generally kept down without regard to passing trains. During that time, therefore, they had no more relation to passing trains than the signal tower or any other inanimate object at or near the crossing. Gates at a railroad crossing have a useful purpose. Open, they proclaim safety to the passing public; closed, they proclaim danger; but, it is manifest, if they be open or closed, regardless of safety or danger, they cannot be notice of either. Counsel perceive this, and extend their contention to urging that it is the duty of those who want to cross, be they pedestrians or those driving teams, to seek the gateman, and not to attempt to cross until he raise the gates.

Those driving teams must do so if they pass at all, and a controversy such as this record presents could not occur as to them. But there are more who walk than ride, and every time their way is stopped by gates at a railroad crossing must they awake a sleeping gateman, or seek an absent one, or be charged with negligence, and that despite the fact that the practice of the railroad company has made closed gates not necessarily an indication of danger? The contention makes the neglect of duty by the railroad as efficacious as the performance of duty. At times a railroad must have exclusive use of a crossing, but at such times it is its duty to close the gates. The use over, it is its duty to open them, and it cannot [476] neglect that duty and claim the same consequence as if it had been performed. The instructions of the court were very guarded. It told the jury if the gates where the injury occurred were generally kept down at night from 10:30 or 11 o'clock, without regard to the presence or absence of trains, and that deceased had knowledge of that fact, then "the circumstance that the gates at the intersection of South Capitol street were down at the time of the accident was not of itself a warning to him of the presence of danger, and contributory negligence cannot be imputed to him from that fact alone."

The italics are ours, and the words italicized put a careful limitation upon the instruction, and, so limited, it was not erroneous.

(3.) It was an issue in the case whether the deceased was struck and run over by the Pullman car or by the passenger express No. 78, and on that issue the court instructed the jury that if the deceased was struck and run over by the passenger express, their verdict should be for the plaintiffs in error. This instruction is complained of. Plaintiffs in error contend that there was no evidence from which it could be determined that it was the Pullman car, and not the passenger express train, which injured the deceased, and it was error, therefore, to submit the issue to the jury. The action of the court was right. There was certainly evidence on the issue from which reasonable men might draw different conclusions.

As we have already seen, the most direct evidence of the passing of the north bound express was to the effect that "the runaway car passed the southwest crossing before 78 (the passenger express) reached there; it struck first the middle part of No. 78 as the train came by there; the runaway car had just about gotten across the crossing when the engine of 78 began to cross the crossing; it was almost about the same time."

If it be admitted that this leaves the issue in doubt, and justifies no inference, there are circumstances to be considered. If the deceased was struck by No. 78, it is difficult to understand how he got to the place and in the condition he was found. *Was he [477] hurled there by the impact of the train? If that were possible, how came his legs to be crushed? Not by the runaway car, because that had passed; not by train 78, for he had been cast aside and away from that. The circumstances, therefore, seem to indicate that he was not struck by train 78, but was run over by the runaway car, and, we think, there is nothing inconsistent with that conclusion in his statement. His situation was horrible. If, in our different situation, we may venture to judge of it at all, we may wonder that he had or could retain any perception of what had occurred. Certainly, exact accuracy of statement could not have been expected of him, and to his shocked and almost overwhelmed senses it might well have seemed that not one car only, but a train of cars had run over him. Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Error to state court—Federal question—limitation of liability in interstate carriage.

1. Argued November 5, 1903. Decided December 7, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania to review a judgment which affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia in favor of plaintiff in a suit to recover for a loss resulting from the negligence of a carrier in transporting a shipment of property. Affirmed.

See same case below, 202 Pa. 222, 51 Atl. 990.

Statement by Mr. Justice Day:

The defendants in error brought suit in the court of common pleas of Philadelphia against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to recover for injuries to a horse shipped by them from Albany in the state of New York to Cynwyd, in the state of Pennsylvania. The shipment was under a bill of lading of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, bearing date of August 10, 1900. It recited the receipt of the horse—

“for transportation from — to destination, if on the said carrier’s line of railroad, otherwise to the place where said live stock is to be received by the connecting carriers for transportation to or toward destination, and that the same has been received by said carrier for itself and on behalf of connecting carriers, for transportation, subject to the official tariffs, classifications and rules of the said company, and upon the following terms and conditions, which are admitted and accepted by the said shipper as just and reasonable, viz.:

“That said shipper, or the consignee, is to pay freight thereon to the said carrier at the rate of — per —, which is the lower published tariff rate, upon the express condition that the carrier assumes liability on the said live stock to the extent only of the following agreed valuation, upon which valuation is based the rate charged for the transportation of the said animals, and beyond which valuation neither the said carrier *nor any connecting carrier shall be liable in [479] any event, whether the loss or damage occur through the negligence of the said carrier or connecting carriers, or their employees or otherwise.

“If horses or mules—not exceeding $100 each.”

The through rate of freight was not filled out in the blanks in the shipping receipt or the bill of lading, but was collected by the agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at Cynwyd, and it appears was the reduced tariff rate usually charged on such shipments where the limited liability clause above recited is inserted. The shipper signed the bill of lading, which contained the following stipulations:

“Thomas Grady does hereby acknowledge that he had the option of shipping the above-described live stock at a higher rate of freight according to the official tariffs, classifications, and rules of the said carrier and connecting carriers, and thereby receiving the security of the liability of the said carrier and connecting railroad and transportation companies, as common carriers of the said live stock, upon their respective roads and lines, but has voluntarily decided to ship the same under this contract at the reduced rate of freight above first mentioned.”

The agreement further provided:

“No carrier shall be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its own road or its portion of the through route, nor after said property is ready for delivery to the next carrier or to consignee. The amount of any loss or damage for which any carrier becomes liable shall be computed at the value of the property at the place and time of shipment under this bill of lading, unless a lower value has been agreed upon or is determined by the classification upon which the rate is based, in either of which events such lower value shall be the maximum price to govern such computation.”

Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $10,000, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The horse was transported in safety to the end of the line of the receiving carrier, and delivered to the defendant company, *and in-[480]jured while the car in which he was shipped was standing on the track of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in the city of Philadelphia, it being run into by heavily laden cars.

Upon appeal to the supreme court of Pennsylvania, the judgment was affirmed. 202 Pa. 222, 51 Atl. 990.

Mr. John G. Johnson argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The common law of the United States as interpreted by this court permits carriers, in the course of interstate commerce, in consideration of making a reduced rate, to limit their liability to a designated valuation.

Mr. A. S. L. Shields argued the cause and filed a brief for defendants in error:

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

The right to review the judgment of the supreme court of Pennsylvania herein depends upon the proper assertion of a right or privilege under the Federal Constitution or statutes which was denied to the plaintiff in error by the adverse holding of the state court.

Upon the trial in the common pleas court, it was contended that the special contract above recited limited the recovery of the plaintiff to the sum of $100. The court refused to so charge, but holding that the policy and law of Pennsylvania, as declared by her courts of last resort, did not permit such limitations on the liability of common carriers, left to the jury to determine the value of the horse, and the question of the negligence of the defendant.

In view of being carried to the supreme court of Pennsylvania, two errors were assigned to the refusal of the court to charge:

[485] "1. That it was lawful in the state of New York for the carrier to limit its liability by a special contract for an injury resulting from its negligence; that said contract having been *for a through consignment from Albany to Cynwyd, a place within this state, said contract must be considered in its entirety, and is incapable of divisibility; that said contract having stipulated for an agreed valuation of the stock shipped, the parties must be governed by its terms throughout the entire route, as said contract must be interpreted and enforced here by the law of the place where it was made, and within which state it was partly performed; and that consequently the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in excess of the valuation agreed upon by the parties at the time of shipment.

"2. That the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in excess of $100."

Neither of these assignments of error presents a Federal question in such sense as to give this court jurisdiction to review the judgment of the state court under § 709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 575). Nothing is better settled in Federal jurisprudence than that the jurisdiction of this court in such cases depends upon the assertion of a right, title, privilege, or immunity under the Federal Constitution or laws set up and denied in the state courts. Beals v. Cone, 188 U. S. 184, 47 L. ed. 435, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275.

The first error assigned in the common pleas court raised the question as to the law of the contract. It does not assert that any Federal right was invaded or denied. It seems to have been conceded at the trial that the law of the state of New York, where the contract was made, permitted the making of a contract limiting the liability of the carrier to the agreed valuation in consideration of the lower freight rate for carriage, the shipper having the opportunity to have the larger liability for the value of the goods if the higher rate of freight for carriage was paid. This rule also prevails in the courts of the United States (Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151), wherein it was held that a contract fairly made and signed by the shipper, agreeing on a valuation of the property carried, with a rate of freight based on such valuation, on the condition that the carrier assume liability only to the extent of such agreed valuation *in case of loss by the negli- [486] gence of the carrier, will be upheld as a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier is responsible and the freight received, and of protecting the carrier against extravagant valuations. But this is not a question of Federal law wherein the decision of the highest Federal tribunal is of conclusive authority. In Grogan v. Adams Exp. Co. 114 Pa. 523, 60 Am. Rep. 360, 7 Atl. 134, the supreme court of Pennsylvania expressly declined to follow the rule laid down in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. adhering to its own declared doctrine denying the right of a common carrier to thus limit its liability for injuries resulting from negligence. The cases are numerous and conflicting, different rules prevailing in different states. The Federal courts in cases of which they have jurisdiction will doubtless continue to follow the rule of the Hart Case, but the highest court of Pennsylvania may administer the common law according to its understanding and interpretation of it, being only amenable to review in the Federal Supreme Court where some right, title, immunity, or privilege, the creation of the Federal power, has been asserted and denied. Bethell v. Demaret, 10 Wall. 537, 19 L. ed. 1007; Delmas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 14 Wall. 666, 20 L. ed. 759; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Hendren, 92 U. S. 287, 23 L. ed. 709; United States v. Thompson, 93 U. S. 586, 23 L. ed. 982.

In the supreme court of Pennsylvania a further assignment of error was made as follows:

"III. The learned court below erred in entering judgment in conflict with the act of Congress of February 4, 1887, entitled 'An Act to Regulate Commerce.' Section 1 of said act clearly provides that where the transportation is from one state to another, under a through bill of lading, its provisions shall be carried out, unless it be in conflict with a statute of the state in which it may be performed, or in conflict with the policy of the United States as laid down in the Federal courts, and that, as the contract was valid in the place where made, and, as there is no statute in Pennsylvania prohibitory of an agreed valuation to establish a rate, and as it is consistent with the policy of the United States as declared by the Federal *courts, the judgment should have been [487] for the valuation mentioned in the contract."

Of this assignment of error, Mr. Justice Potter, delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, said:

"The third assignment of error suggests that the entry of judgment is in conflict with the Interstate Commerce Act of Congress. This seems to be an afterthought, as there is no indication in the record that this question was raised or considered in the court below. It is not apparent how the act can have any application to this case. It contains nothing bearing upon the validity of a contract limiting the liability of a railroad for loss or injury caused by negligence. The object of the act seems to me to be to secure continuous carriage and uniform rates, and to compel the furnishing of equal facilities. We cannot see that the entry of judgment in this case interferes in any way with the legitimate exercise of interstate commerce."

Upon the authority of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Elliott, 184 U. S. 533, 46 L. ed. 674, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 446, it may be admitted that the question of the decision of the state court being in contravention of the legislation of Congress to regulate interstate commerce was sufficiently made, and the adverse decision to the party claiming the benefit of that act gives rise to the right of review here. In refusing to limit the recovery to the valuation agreed upon, did the state court deny to the company a right or privilege secured by the interstate commerce law? It may be assumed that under the broad power conferred upon Congress over interstate commerce as defined in repeated decisions of this court, it would be lawful for that body to make provision as to contracts for interstate carriage, permitting the carrier to limit its liability to a particular sum in consideration of lower freight rates for transportation. But upon examination of the terms of the law relied upon we fail to find any such provision therein. The sections of the interstate commerce law relied upon by the learned counsel for plaintiff in error (24 Stat. at L. 379-82, chap. 104, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3154-3159; 25 Stat. at L. 855, chap. 382, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, [488] p. 3158,) provide for equal *facilities to shippers for the interchange of traffic; for nondiscrimination in freight rates; for keeping schedules of rates open to public inspection; for posting the same in public places, with certain particulars as to charges, rules, and regulations; for the publication of joint tariff rates for continuous transportation over one or more lines, to be made public when directed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; against advances in joint tariff rates except after ten days' notice to the commission; against reduction of joint tariff rates except after three days' like notice; making it unlawful for any party to a joint tariff to receive or demand a greater or less compensation for the transportation of property between points as to which a joint tariff is made different than is specified in the schedule filed with the commission; giving remedies for the enforcement of the foregoing provisions, and providing penalties for their violation; making it unlawful to prevent continuous carriage, and providing that no break of bulk, stoppage or interruption by the carrier, unless made in good faith for some necessary purpose, without intention to evade the act, shall prevent the carriage of freights from being treated as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination.

While under these provisions it may be said that Congress has made it obligatory to provide proper facilities for interstate carriage of freight, and has prevented carriers from obstructing continuous shipments on interstate lines, we look in vain for any regulation of the matter here in controversy. There is no sanction of agreements of this character limiting liability to stipulated valuations, and, until Congress shall legislate upon it, is there any valid objection to the state enforcing its own regulations upon the subject, although it may to this extent indirectly affect interstate commerce contracts of carriage?

It is well settled that the state may make valid enactments in the exercise of its legislative power to promote the welfare and convenience of its citizens, although in their operation they may have an effect upon interstate traffic.

*In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169[489] U. S. 614-635, 42 L. ed. 878, 885, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488, 496, after reviewing previous cases in this court, Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"These cases all proceed upon the ground that the regulation of the enjoyment of the relative rights and the performance of the duties of all persons within the jurisdiction of a state belong primarily to such state under its reserved power to provide for the safety of all persons and property within its limits; and that even if the subject of such regulations be one that may be taken under the exclusive control of Congress, and be reached by national legislation, any action taken by the state upon that subject does not directly interfere with rights secured by the Constitution of the United States or by some valid act of Congress, must be respected until Congress intervenes."

In the absence of Congressional legislation upon the subject, an act of the legislature of Alabama, to require locomotive engineers to be examined and licensed by a board to be appointed by the governor for that purpose, was sustained in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564.

An enumeration of the instances in which this court has sustained the validity of local laws intended to promote the safety and comfort of passengers, employees, persons crossing railroad tracks, and adjacent property owners, is given in the opinion by Mr. Justice Brown, in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514-16, 44 L. ed. 868, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722.

The case of Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 688, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289, is, in our opinion, virtually decisive of the question made upon this branch of the case. In that case cattle were loaded at Rock Valley, Iowa, to be shipped to Chicago. The contract, as here, was for interstate transportation. An injury happened to the drover in charge of the cattle in Iowa, due to the negligence of the transporting company. The shipper had signed a contract providing: "That the company shall in no event be liable to the owner or person in charge of said stock for any injury to his person in any amount exceeding the sum of $500.00." The company averred and offered to prove *that, in view of this limited liability, it had agreed to transport the cattle at a reduced rate. The statute of Iowa provided: "No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any corporation engaged in transporting persons or property by railway from liability of a common carrier, or carrier of passengers, which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation been made or entered into." Iowa Code of 1879, § 1308. The trial court charged that the limitation contained in the contract was void, and a verdict of $1,000.00 damages was returned. A judgment on the verdict was affirmed in the supreme court of Iowa. In delivering the opinion of this court, Mr. Justice Gray said:

"A carrier exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable, according to the law of the state, for acts of nonfeasance or of misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fails to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time and place, or if by negligence in transportation he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, the right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. It is equally within the power of the state to prescribe the safeguards and precautions foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent by anticipation those wrongs and injuries which, after they have been inflicted, the state has the power to redress and punish. The rules prescribed for the construction of railroads, and for their management and operation, designed to protect persons and property, otherwise endangered by their use, are strictly within the scope of the local law.

191 U. S. U. S., Book 48.

They are not, in themselves, regulations of interstate commerce, although they control, in some degree, the conduct and the liability of those engaged in such commerce. So long as Congress has not legislated upon the particular subject, they are rather to be regarded as legislation in aid of such commerce, and as a rightful exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its limits. . . . The statute now *in question, so far as it concerns liability for injuries happening within the state of Iowa,—which is the only matter presented for decision in this case,—clearly comes within the same principles. It is in no just sense a regulation of commerce. It does not undertake to impose any tax upon the company, or to restrict the persons or things to be carried, or to regulate the rate of tolls, fares, or freight. Its whole object and effect are to make it more sure that railroad companies shall perform the duty, resting upon them by virtue of their employment as common carriers, to use the utmost care and diligence in the transportation of passengers and goods."

It is true that this language was used of a statute of Iowa enacting a rule of obligation for common carriers in that state. But the principle recognized is that, in the absence of Congressional legislation upon the subject, a state may require a common carrier, although in the execution of a contract for interstate carriage, to use great care and diligence in the carrying of passengers and transportation of goods, and to be liable for the whole loss resulting from negligence in the discharge of its duties.

We can see no difference in the application of the principle based upon the manner in which the state requires this degree of care and responsibility, whether enacted into a statute or resulting from the rules of law enforced in the state courts. The state has a right to promote the welfare and safety of those within its jurisdiction by requiring common carriers to be responsible to the full measure of the loss resulting from their negligence, a contract to the contrary notwithstanding. This requirement in the case just cited is held not to be an unlawful attempt to regulate interstate commerce, in the absence of Congressional action providing a different measure of liability when contracts such as the one now before us are made in relation to interstate carriage. Its pertinence to the case under consideration renders further discussion unnecessary.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is affirmed.

TEXAS & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 492-498.)

Appeal—finality of judgment—specific performance—covenant not to build railroad station.

1. A decree of a circuit court of appeals which reversed a decree of a circuit court sustaining a demurrer to, and dismissing a bill for, specific performance, and dismissed the bill without prejudice to an action at law, is final for the purpose of review in the Supreme Court of the United States.
2. Public policy precludes a decree for the specific performance of a covenant in a deed of a railroad's right of way not to build or establish a depot within 3 miles of the one therein stipulated for,—especially where the erection of the structure in dispute has been ordered by the state railroad commission.

Submitted December 3, 1903. Decided December 14, 1903.

A PPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit to review a decree which reversed a decree of the Circuit Court for the Western District of Louisiana sustaining a demurrer to, and dismissing a bill for, specific performance, and ordered the bill to be dismissed without prejudice to an action at law. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 C. C. A. 434, 115 Fed. 952.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. B. Kruttschnitt and W. P. Hall submitted the cause for appellants.

Messrs. John F. Dillon, William Wirt Howe, and Walker B. Spencer submitted the cause for appellee.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of appeals ordering a bill against a railway company incorporated under the laws of the United States to be dismissed. The bill seeks to enjoin the railway company from building a depot within 3 miles of one already built at Uni, in Louisiana, and alleges the following facts: Mrs. Beasley, the first-named plaintiff, conveyed to a Louisiana corporation—the Texarkana, Shreveport, & Natchez Railway Company—a strip of land 100 feet wide, for a railroad track through her plantation, habendum to the company and its assigns so long as the *railroad was[494] maintained and operated over the strip. By the act of sale, which was executed by both parties, it was declared to be a part of the consideration for the transfer “that the grantee or its assigns shall not build . . . or establish any other depot along the line of said railroad within three miles north or south of the one stipulated for.” The defendant purchased the road from the grantee “subject to the obligations and stipulations contained in” the act of sale. It now is constructing a depot on the road within a mile and a fraction of the one at Uni. The bill further alleges that there is no public necessity for a depot within the stipulated limits. There was a demurrer for the reason that there is an adequate remedy at law, and the demurrer was sustained by the circuit court, and the bill dismissed. This decree was reversed by the circuit court of appeals, and the bill was ordered to be dismissed for want of equity, without prejudice to an action at law. There is a motion to dismiss the appeal to this court on the ground that the decree was not final in form; but the decisions are the other way, and the case being one in which the decree of the circuit court of appeals can be reviewed in this court under the act of March 3, 1891 [26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 547] we have jurisdiction, and the motion must be overruled. Merrill v. National Bank, 173 U. S. 131, 43 L. ed. 640, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360. See Great Western Tel. Co. v. Burnham, 162 U. S. 339, 342, 40 L. ed. 991, 992, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 850.

The act of sale gives its own definition of the word “depot,” but no question is made that the depot intended to be built is within the prohibition of the instrument in that and other respects. We assume that if the plaintiff's grantee had built the structure it would have broken its agreement. We also assume, for the purposes of the case, without deciding, that the contract, as a contract, is not void, although similar contracts have been pronounced void in some of the cases cited below. On these assumptions the question is how far the burden of that agreement passed to the defendant, and whether, at least as against the defendant, equity will require it to be specifically performed.

*Such a liability, wherever asserted, would[495] have to be worked out, if at all, in terms of easement, covenant running with the land, implied contract, or equitable restriction.

Although the Louisiana Code recognizes such servitudes “as the prohibition of building on an estate, or of building above a particular height" (Rev. Civil Code, art. 728 [724]; see art. 718 [714]), and although it has been held at common law that such a servitude for the benefit of neighboring land may be created within reasonable limits, and created by words of covenant (Ladd v. Boston, 151 Mass. 585, 588, 24 N. E. 858; Brown v. O'Brien, 168 Mass. 484, 47 N. E. 195; compare La. Rev. Civil Code, art. 743 [739]), it was not argued that there was an easement in this case. It would be questionable whether the obligation was "not imposed on the person or in favor of the person, but only on an estate or in favor of an estate" (La. Rev. Civil Code, art. 709 [705]; Code Napoleon, 686); whether it was not, in the words of Marcadé, commenting on this article of the Code Napoléon, a servitude réelle entachée de personnalité. 2 Marcadé, 627. "There can be no prædial servitude when the object is merely to satisfy the wants of the present owner." Sohm, Inst. Roman Law, Ledlie's transl. § 56, II., p. 262. Apart from the peculiarities of Louisiana law, there would be almost equal difficulty in regarding the agreement as a covenant the burden of which ran with the land according to the principles of the common law, and for substantially the same reason. It is true that the covenant is negative, but it does not benefit the use and occupation of the plaintiff's land physically, and is not intended to. It is intended simply to improve the market value of that land by giving to it a right not to be competed with in the way of railway conveniences. Norcross v. James, 140 Mass. 188, 192, 2 N. E. 946. As to an implied contract, that would be a fiction, and the plaintiff's rights, so far as the question of policy is concerned, would not be enlarged by adopting that form. See Lincoln v. Burrage, 177 Mass. 378, 380, 52 L. R. A. 110, 59 N. E. 67.

[496] Whether the true theory of equitable restrictions is the same *as that of covenants running with the land, or different, as their historical antecedents are different in part, it would seem that the two must have somewhat similar limits. With regard to injunctions, we see in art. 298, 3, of the Code of Practice, cited by the plaintiff, no reason to suppose that the law of Louisiana is peculiar in any way affecting the present case. Whatever the form which the attempt to restrict may take, obviously it is not desirable to allow large tracts of land to be tied up and cut off from the ordinary incidents of ownership, according to the invention of the owner, in perpetuity, in favor of other large tracts which may come by division into many hands. La. Rev. Civil Code, art. 656 (652). See Parish v. Municipality, No. 2, 8 La. Ann. 145, 169. If such restrictions should be enforced without limit in equity as against all purchasers with notice, the practical result would be an unlimited extension of easements; since notice always can be secured by registration. Easements hitherto have been confined pretty narrowly, both in quality and in space. Equitable relief has been refused upon a covenant by a grantee not to open or work a quarry upon his land adjoining the land conveyed, in a suit between assignees of the original grantor and grantee. It was a mere covenant against competition. Norcross v. James, 140 Mass. 188, 2 N. E. 946. On the other hand, a covenant by a grantee not to sell sand from half an acre was enforced against the grantee's son and grantee in favor of the grantor in Hodge v. Sloan, 107 N. Y. 244, 17 N. E. 335, and in old times it would seem that a covenant in connection with a gift of a mill in Tenbury not to raise another mill in Tenbury might have been enforced against the heir of the covenantor. Y. B. 5 Edw. III., 57, pl. 71; S. C. 7 Edw. III., 65, pl. 6, 7. Of course, there are numberless cases in which contracts have been enforced which in a more immediate sense affected the occupation and enjoyment of the quasi dominant land. It is to be noted, too, that the restriction is confined to a narrow strip, which very likely might have been subjected to a servitude of way.

We do not think it necessary to decide whether the foregoing *general considera-[497] tions would be enough to prevent the burden of this agreement falling on the defendant, or whether the allegation which has been quoted, and which means no more than that the defendant bought with notice, is enough to establish a relation of contract or quasi contract between the parties. There are more specific obstacles in the way of the bill. Whether a railroad station shall be built in a certain place is a question involving public interests. Assuming that a contract like the present is valid as a contract, and making the more debatable assumption that the burden of the contract passed to a purchaser with notice, it does not follow that such a contract will be specifically enforced. Illegality apart, a man may make himself answerable in damages for the happening or not happening of what event he likes. But he cannot secure to his contractor the help of the court to bring that event to pass, unless it is in accordance with policy to grant that help. To compel the specific performance of contracts still is the exception, not the rule, and courts would be slow to compel it in cases where it appears that paramount interests will or even may be interfered with by their action. It has been intimated by this court that a covenant much like the present should not be enforced in equity, and that the railroad should be left at liberty to follow the course which its best interests and those of the public demand. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 405, 34 L. ed. 385, 390, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846; Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington, 142 U. S. 492, 509, 35 L. ed. 1092, 1098, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283. See further, Marsh v. Fairbury, P. & N. W. R. Co. 64 Ill. 414, 16 Am. Rep. 564; People ex rel. Hunt v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 130 Ill. 175, 184, 22 N. E. 857; St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Ryan, 11 Kan. 602, 15 Am. Rep. 357; Pacific R. Co. v. Seely, 45 Mo. 212, 100 Am. Dec. 369; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. State, 31 Fla. 482, 508, 20 L. R. A. 419, 13 So. 103; Currie v. Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. 61 Miss. 725, 731; Holladay v. Patterson, 5 Or. 177; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott, 23 C. C. A. 424, 429, 37 L. R. A. 94, 41 U. S. App. 624, 77 Fed. 726.

The difficulty is illustrated as well as made greater in the case at bar. There is in [498] Louisiana a railroad commission having *authority to require all railroads to build and maintain depots. La. Const. 1898, art. 384. That fact is enough to suggest the possibility of a conflict if an injunction were granted. But further, although it was not pleaded, it was admitted at the bar that the commission had ordered the erection of the station in dispute. It is true that this admission was coupled with charges of improper influence. But such imputations would not be tried or listened to in a collateral proceeding like this. It is apparent, therefore, that if the facts appeared of record an injunction would be denied, and that as soon as they do appear it must be denied, so that a trial would be an public necessity or demand for a depot within the stipulated limit. But this no more could be tried for the purpose of collaterally impeaching the decision of the railroad commission than could the purity of their motives.

It is objected that the foregoing was not the ground of the demurrer. But as was observed by the court below, other grounds are open on demurrer ore tenus, and apart from that consideration, if it appears that an injunction would be against public policy, the court properly may refuse to be made an instrument for such a result, whatever the pleadings. The defendant may desire the relief to be granted. It is suggested that it does. But the very meaning of public policy is the interest of others than the parties, and that interest is not to be at the mercy of the defendant alone. See Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington, 142 U. S. 492, 509, 35 L. ed. 1092, 1098, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice Brewer concurred in the result. Mr. Justice Brown took no part in the decision.

BOARD OF COUNCILMEN OF THE CITY OF FRANKFORT.

Judgments—conclusiveness as between Federal and state courts.

A final decree of a Federal court enjoining the collection of certain taxes, and adjudging that an irrevocable contract of exemption from taxation which, under the Federal Constitution, cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation, was constituted by Ky. Sess. Laws 1885-6, pp. 140, 144-7, 201, which decree rests upon the effect as res judicata of a similar judgment of an inferior state court respecting taxes of other years, is, while it remains in force, conclusive in the further proceedings had in the state court, notwithstanding the reversal of its original judgment by the highest state court after the decree of the Federal court was rendered, and the repudiation both by the highest state court and, in another case, by the Federal Supreme Court, of the view that there was a contract exemption, and the fact that by the settled law of Kentucky an adjudication in respect of taxes for one year cannot be pleaded as an estoppel in suits involving taxes of other years.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky to review a judgment which reversed a judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court dismissing the petition in an action for the recovery of taxes from a bank. Reversed and remanded.

See same case below, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1285, 65 S. W. 10.

Statement by Mr. Justice Day:

This action was brought by the board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort, in the Franklin circuit court, for the recovery of certain ad valorem taxes under levies for the years 1892, 1893, and 1894. The tax for the year 1892 has been eliminated from the controversy, and the matters now disputed include the taxes for the years 1893 and 1894, and interest. The bank in the first instance relied upon the provisions of a certain law of the state of Kentucky, known as the Hewitt law, as exempting it from *the taxes sought to be enforced. This law was passed in 1886 (Session Laws of Kentucky, 1885-6, pp. 140, 144-7, 201), and provided:

"Section 1. That shares of stock in state or national banks, and other institutions of loan or discount, and in all corporations required by law to be taxed on their capital stock, shall be taxed 75 cents on each share thereof equal to $100, or on each $100 of stock therein owned by individuals, corporations, or societies, and said banks, institutions, and corporations shall, in addition, pay upon each $100 of so much of their surplus, undivided surplus, and undivided accumulations as exceeds an amount equal to 10 per cent of their capital stock, which shall be in full of all tax, state, county, and municipal.

"Sec. 4. That each of said banks, institutions, or corporations, by its corporate authority, with the consent of a majority in interest of a quorum of its stockholders, at a regular or called meeting thereof, may give its consent to the levy of said tax, and agree to pay the same as herein provided, and to waive and release all rights under the act of Congress, or under the charters of the state banks, to a different mode or smaller rate of taxation, which consent or agreement to and with the state of Kentucky shall be evidenced by writing, under the seal of such bank, and delivered to the governor of this commonwealth; and upon such agreement and consent being delivered, and in consideration thereof, such bank and its shares of stock shall be exempt from all other taxation whatsoever so long as said tax shall be paid during the corporate existence of such bank.

"Sec. 5. The said bank may take the proceeding authorized by § 4 of this act at any time until the meeting of the next general assembly: provided, they pay the tax provided in § 1 from the passage of this act.

"Sec. 6. This act shall be subject to the provisions of § 8, chapter 68, of the General Statutes.

[501] "Sec. 7. If any bank, state or national, shall fail or refuse to pay the tax imposed by this act, or shall fail or refuse to make the consent and agreement as prescribed in § 4, the shares of stock of such bank, institution, or corporation, and its surplus, undivided accumulations, and undivided profits, shall be assessed as directed by § 2 of this act, and the taxes — state, county, and municipal — shall be imposed, levied, and collected upon the assessed shares, surplus, undivided profits, undivided accumulations, as is imposed upon the assessed taxable property in the hands of individuals: Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as exempting from taxation for county or municipal purposes any real estate or building owned and used by said banks or corporations for conducting their business, but the same may be taxed for county and municipal purposes as other real estate is taxed."

The Deposit Bank of Frankfort accepted the terms of the Hewitt law, and made payment of the taxes as therein provided.

The circuit court of Franklin county, by judgment upon the pleadings in this case, sustained the bank's claim of exemption, holding the Hewitt law to be an irrevocable contract between the bank and the state. Upon appeal, this judgment was reversed by the Kentucky court of appeals, that court holding that the Hewitt act did not constitute an irrevocable contract, and had been repealed by the later act of 1892, under which act the bank was not exempt from payment of the taxes in controversy.

After the case was remanded to the circuit court for a new trial the bank filed a supplementary answer, setting up as an estoppel a decree of the United States circuit court for the district of Kentucky rendered in 1898, in a case to which the bank and the complainant were parties. The decree in that case was rendered upon a bill filed by the bank, in which it set up, among other things, a certain judgment of the Franklin circuit court rendered in 1896, in which it was adjudged that the Hewitt law constituted an irrevocable contract exempting the bank from taxation. At the time of the rendition of the *decree in the [502] United States court the judgment of the state circuit court relied on was in full force although subsequently reversed by the Kentucky court of appeals.

In the Federal court the following decree was rendered:

"The court being sufficiently advised, files its opinion herein.

"It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed as follows:

"First. That the demurrer of the defendants Board of Councilmen of the city of Frankfort and Franklin county and of the defendants Samuel H. Stone, G. W. Long, and Charles Finley be, and the said demurrers are, hereby overruled; to which the said defendants each except.

"Second. The plea of defendants Board of Councilmen of the city of Frankfort and Franklin county to the bill of complaint is overruled; to which the said defendants except.

"Third. Thereupon came the complainant, by Frank Chinn, its counsel, and files its replication to the answer of the defendants

Board of Councilmen of the city of Frankfort and Franklin county. The defendants county of Franklin and city of Frankfort offered to file an amended answer; to which complainant objected, and the motion to file is overruled; to which said defendants except, and said amended answer is made a part of the record by the order of the court.

"And by consent this cause came on to be heard for final decree. The complainant read upon hearing its bill of complaint and its amended bill of complaint herein, together with all the exhibits filed with said bills, to wit:

"Exhibit 'A,' being the record of the proceedings in the case of Deposit Bank of Frankfort against Franklin County and John W. Gaines, sheriff.

"Exhibit 'B,' being the records in the proceedings in the case of Deposit Bank of Frankfort against Franklin county and R. D. Armstrong, sheriff.

"Exhibit 'C,' being judgment of Franklin circuit court, entered February 1, 1896, in the suit of Deposit Bank of Frankfort against Franklin County.

[503] "Exhibit 'D,' being record of the proceedings in the case of *Board of Councilmen of City of Frankfort against Deposit Bank of Franklin.

"The defendant, The County of Franklin, read on the hearing its answer, and the defendant Board of Councilmen of the City of Frankfort read on the hearing the record of the proceedings in the case of Board of Councilmen of City of Frankfort against L. C. Norman, auditor, etc., and also read its answer.

"And it is now adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the defendants Samuel H. Stone, Charles Finley, and George W. Long be, and they are hereby, perpetually enjoined and restrained from proceeding to value the franchise of the complainant under the act of November 11, 1892, for the years 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, or for any other subsequent years until the expiration of the charter of the complainant, and are enjoined and restrained from certifying such value to the county clerk of Franklin county or to any officer of the board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort or the county of Franklin; and the defendants County of Franklin and Board of Councilmen of the City of Frankfort are enjoined and restrained from endeavoring to collect any tax upon any such valuations; and the complainant, by making payments in accordance with the Hewitt law, is discharged in full from all taxes to be exacted from it under any form or by any authority.

"It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that by reason of the several pleas of res judicata, relied on by the complainant in its bill, and as shown by the exhibits therewith, the complainant has established a contract with the commonwealth of Kentucky, under the provisions of article 2 of the act of the general assembly of the state of Kentucky, entitled 'An Act to Amend the Revenue Laws of the Commonwealth of Kentucky,' approved May 17, 1886, and the acceptance of the same by the complainant, the terms of which contract the commonwealth cannot alter or change without the consent of the complainant; that by the terms of this contract the complainant and its shares of stock cannot, during its corporate existence, be assessed for taxation for state purposes in a different *mode or at a [504] greater rate of taxation than as prescribed in said act, and can be assessed for taxation and taxed for county and municipal purposes only upon its real estate used by it in conducting its business; that the provisions of the present Constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and the act of November 11, 1892, in so far as they are intended to provide or do provide for any assessment or taxation of the complainant's property, rights of property, or franchise, or shares of stock, except to the extent and in the manner provided by § 1, 2, and 3 of article 2 of the said act approved May 17, 1886, and except to assess and tax for county and municipal purposes upon its real estate used in conducting its business, are in violation of and repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and void.

"And it is further adjudged that the complainant recover of the defendant its costs in this action expended.

"And came defendants and prayed an appeal in open court, and tendered their assignment of errors; whereupon the court allowed the appeal, and orders the assignment of errors to be filed, and fixes the appeal bond at $1,000."

This decree of 1898 was afterwards affirmed in this court. 174 U. S. 800, 43 L. ed. 1187, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881. The Franklin circuit court in the case now before us dismissed the petition upon the ground that there had been no proper return of no property found, and did not pass upon the question as to whether the decree of the United States court was effectual as an estoppel between the parties. Upon appeal to the court of appeals of Kentucky, it was held by a majority of the court, three judges dissenting, that the decree relied upon was not an estoppel. By writ of error that judgment is brought here for review.

Mr. Frank Chinn argued the cause, and, with Mr. D. W. Lindsey, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The decree of the Federal court, relied on as a bar to this action having been rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties, is conclusive upon the city in every other court so long as that decree stands unreversed.

And the fact that this action was begun before the bill in the Federal court suit was filed does not alter the rule.

Metcalf v. Watertown, 153 U. S. 680, 38 L. ed. 865, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947.

The so-called Hewitt law, set forth in the foregoing statement, has given rise to much litigation in the courts of Kentucky, as well as in those of the United States. At one time it was held by the court of appeals of Kentucky that its provisions, when complied with by the bank seeking to avail itself of its privileges, constituted a valid and binding contract. Com. use of Franklin County v. Farmers' Bank, 97 Ky. 590, 31 S. W. 1013. In a later case the court of appeals of Kentucky held the law not to constitute an inviolable contract. Deposit Bank v. Daviess County, 102 Ky. 174, 44 L. R. A. 825, 39 S. W. 1030, 44 S. W. 1131. When the law was before this court, the same conclusion was reached. Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 636, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530.

It may be now regarded as the settled law that this enactment did not constitute a contract between the state and the banks as to taxation, but is subject to modification and repeal by subsequent laws of the state undertaking to tax bank property.

In this case we have to deal with the effect of a decree of the circuit court of the United States which is unreversed and affirmed in this court, and in which, between the parties to the present action, it was held that the Hewitt law was a valid enactment, and constituted a contract between the parties within the protection of the contract clause of the Constitution of the United States. A proper consideration of the question requires that it shall be distinctly understood just what this decree is. The bill which was the basis of the action of the court was broad in its terms, and sought not only to enjoin the collection of the taxes for the years 1895-6-7-8, which were involved, but to have it finally adjudicated that the Hewitt law constituted a contract between the parties which shielded the bank from taxation after complying with the provisions of that law. The decree not only provided for [509] *a perpetual injunction enjoining the taxation for the years specifically mentioned, but further:

"It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that by reason of the several pleas of res judicata, relied on by the complainant in its bill, and as shown by the exhibits therewith, the complainant has established a contract with the commonwealth of Kentucky under the provisions of article 2 of the act of the general assembly of the state of Kentucky, entitled 'An Act to Amend the Revenue Laws of the Commonwealth of Kentucky,' approved May 17, 1886, and the acceptance of the same by the complainant, the terms of which contract the commonwealth cannot alter or change without the consent of the complainant; that by the terms of this contract the complainant and its shares of stock cannot, during its corporate existence, be assessed for taxation for state purposes in a different mode or at a greater rate of taxation than as prescribed in said act, and can be assessed for taxation and taxed for county and municipal purposes only upon its real estate used by it in conducting its business; that the provisions of the present Constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky and the act of November 11, 1892, in so far as they are intended to provide or do provide for any assessment or taxation of the complainant's property, rights of property, or franchise, or shares of stock, except to the extent and in the manner provided by §§ 1, 2, and 3 of article 2 of the said act approved May 17, 1886, and except to assess and tax for county and municipal purposes upon its real estate used in conducting its business, are in violation of and repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and void."

The Constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky, adopted after the passage of the Hewitt law, made provision for the enactment of laws for the taxation of the property of banks. Passed under the authority of these constitutional provisions, the act of November 11, 1892, referred to in the decree of the Federal circuit court of 1898, is the legislation subsequent to the Hewitt law under which it is sought to assess and collect taxes involved in the present suit. If this decree is to be given *force and effect, as hav-[510] ing adjudicated the Hewitt law to be a binding contract covering the right to tax the bank, there can be no question that this subsequent legislation is violative of the constitutional inhibition against the states from enacting laws impairing the obligation of contracts. This legislation is in absolute conflict with the Hewitt law. Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 636, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530. The decree declares in terms, as direct and specific as it is possible to make them, that the act now sought to be enforced in the assessment and collection of taxes is in violation of the Federal Constitution, and therefore void.

The judgment of the state court upon which the decree of the Federal court is predicated was equally broad in its terms, and covered not only the particular years of assessment then in question but the broader right of the parties to be protected under the Federal Constitution against state enactments in violation of the contract provision of that instrument.

It is urged that the state judgment upon which the Federal decree of 1898 is based was afterwards reversed by the highest court of Kentucky, and, therefore, the foundation of the decree has been removed, and the decree itself must fall. But is this argument sound? When a plea of res judicata is interposed, based upon a former judgment between the parties, the question is not what were the reasons upon which the judgment proceeded, but what was the judgment itself; was it within the jurisdiction of the court, between the same parties, and is it still in force and effect? The doctrine of estoppel by judgment is founded upon the proposition that all controversies and contentions involved are set at rest by a judgment or decree lawfully rendered which, in its terms, embodied a settlement of the rights of the parties. It would undermine the foundation of the principle upon which it is based if the court might inquire into and revise the reasons which led the court to make the judgment. In such case, nothing would be set at rest by the decree; but the matter supposed to be finally adjudicated, and concerning which the parties had had their day in court, could *be reopened and [511] examined, and if the reasons stated were, in the judgment of the court before which the estoppel is pleaded, insufficient, a new judgment could be rendered because of these divergent views, and the whole matter would be at large. In other words, nothing would be settled, and the judgment, unreversed, instead of having the effect of forever settling the rights of the parties, would be but an idle ceremony. We are unable to find reason or authority supporting the proposition that because a judgment may have been given for wrong reasons or has been subsequently reversed, that it is any the less effective as an estoppel between the parties while in force. In the Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 30 L. ed. 614, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472, the question of what effect should be given to a decision of a court of the United States as proof of probable cause in a suit for a prosecution which was alleged to be malicious was before the court. It appeared that the judgment relied upon had been subsequently reversed, and it was held that this made no difference unless it was shown that the judgment was obtained by means of fraud. Mr. Justice Matthews, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"Its integrity, its validity, and its effect are complete in all respects between all parties in every suit and in every forum where it is legitimately produced as the foundation of an action, or of a defense, either by plea or in proof, as it would be in any other circumstances. While it remains in force it determines the rights of the parties between themselves, and may be carried into execution in due course of law to its full extent, furnishing a complete protection to all who act in compliance with its mandate, and even after reversal it still remains, as in the case of every other judgment or decree in like circumstances, sufficient evidence in favor of the plaintiff who instituted the suit or action in which it is rendered, when sued for a malicious prosecution, that he had probable cause for his proceeding."

The precise question was before the court of appeals of New York in Parkhurst v. Berdell, 110 N. Y. 386, 18 N. E. 123, in which case a judgment was relied upon as an estoppel in a suit between the *same parties. The first suit settled certain matters in controversy in the second suit, and was given force and effect as an estoppel, but was afterwards reversed by the appellate court. The second suit, in which it was relied upon, came before the court of appeals, and it was claimed that the reversal of the judgment in the first suit would avoid its force as an estoppel between the parties. The court said:

"If the judgment roll was competent evidence when received, its reception was not rendered erroneous by the subsequent reversal of the judgment. Notwithstanding its reversal, it continued in this action to have the same effect to which it was entitled when received in evidence. The only relief a party against whom a judgment which has been subsequently reversed has thus been received in evidence can have is to move on that fact in the court of original jurisdiction for a new trial, and then the court can, in the exercise of its discretion, grant or refuse a new trial, as justice may require."

It is to be remembered that we are not dealing with the right of the parties to get relief from the original judgment by bill of review or other process in the Federal court in which it was rendered. There the court may reconsider and set aside or modify its judgment upon seasonable application. In every other forum the reasons for passing the decree are wholly immaterial and the subsequent reversal of the judgment upon which it is predicated can have no other effect than to authorize the party aggrieved to move in some proper proceeding, in the court of its rendition, to modify it or set it aside. It cannot be attacked collaterally, and in every other court must be given full force and effect, irrespective of the reasons upon which it is based. Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 83, and cases cited.

Again, it is urged that the taxes herein involved are those for different years than were under consideration and covered by the decree of the Federal court relied upon. The vice of this argument consists in assuming that the taxes for specific years were alone involved and covered by the decree of the court. *The controversy was as to the force[513] and effect of the Hewitt law as a contract; not for one year, but for all years; not for one assessment, but for all assessments of taxes upon certain property of the bank. The contest was over the contract, and the consequent want of power to collect any and all taxes the assessment of which did violence to the contract rights of the bank. The court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of the suit, and it was adjudicated that there was a contract which was entitled to protection against impairment by state legislation within the right guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. This adjudication necessarily included not only the taxes for specific years, but foreclosed the right to collect any taxes concerning which the contract afforded immunity to the bank. That a bank charter and laws having the effect of bank charters may constitute valid and binding contracts conclusive between the parties is now so well settled by the adjudications of this court as not to be open to discussion. New Orleans v. Citizens Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905. In that case it was held that a judgment of the district court of

New Orleans, holding the charter of a bank to constitute a binding and conclusive contract between the parties, although involving the taxes of other years than those in suit, was res judicata and conclusive between the parties. In the course of the opinion, Mr. Justice White said:

"The proposition that because a suit for a tax of one year is a different demand from the suit for a tax for another, therefore res judicata cannot apply, whilst admitting in form the principle of the things adjudged, in reality substantially denies and destroys it. The estoppel resulting from the thing adjudged does not depend upon whether there is the same demand in both cases, but exists, even although there be different demands, when the question upon which the recovery of the second demand depends has, under identical circumstances and conditions, been previously concluded by a judgment between the parties or their privies. This is the elemental rule, stated in the text books, and enforced by many decisions of this court. . . .

[514] "It follows, then, that the mere fact that the demand in this case is for a tax for one year, and the demands in the adjudged cases were for taxes for other years, does not prevent the operation of the thing adjudged, if, in the prior cases, the question of exemption was necessarily presented and determined upon identically the same facts upon which the right of exemption is now claimed."

This case is cited with approval in Southern P. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 42 L. ed. 355, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18, in which the decisions of this court upon the subject of res judicata are reviewed by Mr. Justice Harlan, and the general doctrine thus stated:

"A right, question, or fact distinctly put in issue and directly determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, as a ground of recovery, cannot be disputed in a subsequent suit between the same parties or their privies; and even if the second suit is for a different cause of action, the right, question, or fact, once so determined, must, as between the same parties or their privies, be taken as conclusively established, so long as the judgment in the first suit remains unmodified."

The thing established by the Federal decree relied upon here was the binding and conclusive character of the contract embodied in the Hewitt law and its acceptance. That it was such a contract was then adjudicated, and, irrespective of the reasons given for the decision, must remain concluded until the judgment constituting such adjudication is modified or reversed.

But it is said that the question here is simply what force and effect the state court should give to the decree of the Federal court relied upon. It is argued that there should be given to a Federal judgment the same force and effect that the state court gives to a judgment of a court of the state in which the Federal judgment is relied upon,—neither more nor less. Cases are cited from the Kentucky court of appeals which may be said to establish that an adjudication concerning taxes for one year cannot be pleaded as an estoppel in suits in that state involving the taxes of other years. It is true that, for some purposes and within certain limits, it is only required that the judgments of *the[515] courts of the United States shall be given the same force and effect as are given the judgments of the courts of the state wherein they are rendered; but it is equally true that whether a Federal judgment has been given due force and effect in the state court is a Federal question reviewable by this court, which will determine for itself whether such judgment has been given due weight or otherwise. Cresecent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 30 L. ed. 614, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Long Island Loan & T. Co. 172 U. S. 493, 43 L. ed. 528, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 238. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Harlan, after reviewing the case upon this subject, thus states his conclusion:

"According to these decisions, and in view of the statute giving this court authority to re-examine the final judgment of the highest court of a state, denying a right specially set up or claimed under an authority exercised under the United States, it is clear that we have jurisdiction to inquire whether due effect was accorded to the foreclosure proceedings in the circuit courts of the United States under which the plaintiff in error claims title to the lands and property in question."

When is the state court obliged to give to Federal judgments only the force and effect it gives to state court judgments within its own jurisdiction? Such cases are distinctly pointed out in the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in Dupasseur v. Rochercau, 21 Wall. 135, 22 L. ed. 590, where the learned justice says:

"The only effect that can be justly claimed for the judgment in the circuit court of the United States is such as would belong to judgments of the state courts rendered under similar circumstances. Dupasseur & Co. were citizens of France, and brought the suit in the circuit court of the United States as such citizens; and consequently that court, deriving its jurisdiction solely from the citizenship of the parties, was in the exercise of jurisdiction to administer the laws of the state, and its proceedings were had in accordance with the forms and course of proceeding in the state courts. It is apparent, therefore, that no higher sanctity or effect can be claimed for the judgment of the circuit court [516] of the United States rendered "in such a case, under such circumstances, than is due to the judgments of the state courts in a like case and under similar circumstances."

The cases which, by clear inference, cannot come within this class, are to be noticed.

When it was said that no higher sanctity or effect can be given to a judgment of the circuit court of the United States than to state judgments, the learned judge is careful to say "in like case, under similar circumstances." What are these cases? Manifestly those just stated, wherein the court derives its jurisdiction from the citizenship of the parties, and in the exercise of the jurisdiction to administer the laws of the state where the proceedings are had. Where language has been used in other cases to the effect that judgments of the Federal courts are to be given the effect given to domestic judgments, they will be found to be cases where questions of general law are under consideration, and coming within the class suggested by Justice Bradley in the opinion quoted. Such is the case of Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 30 L. ed. 614, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472. It was there held that a judgment of the United States court, relied upon as a ground of probable cause in a suit for malicious prosecution was to be given the same force and effect as judgments in the state courts. But Mr. Justice Matthews, delivering the opinion, was careful to add:

"Whatever deference may be due to the decisions of the state court of final resort in every case in which it has spoken, and whatever may be the respect to which its decisions upon questions of purely local law established as rules of property may be entitled, they are not authority binding upon the courts of the United States, sitting even in the same state, where the questions involved and decided relate to rights arising under the Constitutions and laws of the United States."

In Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3, 27 L. ed. 346, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25, it was held that the supreme court of the District of Columbia is a court of the United States, and its judgments conclusive in the courts of a state [517] except for "such cause as would be sufficient to set it aside in the courts of the District."

Mr. Justice Matthews, who delivered the opinion, again stated the doctrine that the judgments of the courts of the United States are upon the same footing, so far as concerns the obligation created by them, with judgments of the states. Other cases are found in the reports stating the general proposition.

191 U. S.

In Union & Planters' Bank v. Memphis, 189 U. S. 71, 47 L. ed. 712, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604, the question was as to the effect to be given to a state judgment as res judicata. It was held that the Federal courts were not required to give such domestic judgments any greater force and effect than was awarded them by the courts of the state where rendered.

But it is equally well settled that a right claimed under the Federal Constitution, finally adjudicated in the Federal courts, can never be taken away or impaired by state decisions. The same reasoning which permits to the states the right of final adjudication upon purely state questions requires no less respect for the final decisions of the Federal courts of questions of national authority and jurisdiction.

This principle is now so thoroughly settled as to need but to be stated. It has been reiterated in a line of decisions following the great judgment of Chief Justice Marshall in Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257, in which the principle was firmly established. As early as Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416-432, 14 L. ed. 997-1003, Chief Justice Taney said:

"Indeed, the duty imposed upon this court to enforce contracts honestly and legally made would be vain and nugatory if we were bound to follow those changes in judicial decisions which the lapse of time and the change in judicial officers will often produce. The writ of error to a state court would be no protection to a contract, if we were bound to follow the judgment which a state court had given, and which the writ of error brings up for revision here." McCullough v. Virginia, 172 U. S. 102, 43 L. ed. 382, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 134; Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 *Black, 436, 17 L. ed. 173; Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U. S. 488, 501, 42 L. ed. 553, 557, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 199, 203, and cases cited. [518]

In the last named case, Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion, deals with the question as follows:

"The defendant insists that his rights having been acquired when these decisions of the highest court of Kentucky were in full force, should be protected according to the law of the state as it was adjudged to be when those rights attached. But is this court required to accept the principles announced by the state court as to the extent to which the contract clause of the Federal Constitution restricts the powers of the state legislatures? Clearly not. The defendant invokes the jurisdiction of this court upon the ground that the rights denied to him by the final judgment of the highest court of Kentucky, and which the state seeks to prevent him from exercising, were acquired under an agreement that constituted a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. This contention is disputed by the state. So that the issue presented makes it necessary to inquire whether that which the defendant asserts to be a contract was a contract of the class to which the Constitution of the United States refers. This court must determine—indeed, it cannot, consistently with its duty, refuse to determine—upon its own responsibility, in each case as it arises, whether that which a party seeks to have protected under the contract clause of the Constitution of the United States is a contract the obligation of which is protected by that instrument against hostile state legislation.” Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. ed. 793, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 968; Knox County v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 147 U. S. 91, 37 L. ed. 93, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 267; McGahey v. Virginia, 135 U. S. 662, 34 L. ed. 304, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972.

These cases thoroughly established the proposition that in no other way can the obligation of the Federal courts under the Constitution be discharged than by rigidly adhering to the right and duty to maintain the ultimate right of the Federal courts to protect the citizens of the United States, and of every state, in the enjoyment of rights and privileges guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

[519] *We suppose there is no question that if the state court had refused to give effect to the Hewitt law as a binding contract, and that question were presented here upon writ of error, and this court reached a different conclusion, holding the Hewitt law to constitute a contract, the judgment of the state court would be reversed for the denial of the right claimed under the Federal Constitution. In the present case we are asked to go further and sustain the judgment of the state court in the face of a judgment of a Federal circuit court, affirmed in this court, and duly invoked for the protection of the party in whose favor it was rendered in an action between the same parties. In Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. v. Iowa Homestead Co. 123 U. S. 552, 31 L. ed. 202, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 217, a suit was brought in an Iowa court by the homestead company to recover taxes for the years 1864 to 1871. The right to recover the same taxes had been litigated between the same parties and decided adversely to the homestead company in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Valley R. Co. 17 Wall. 153, sub nom. Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. 21 L. ed. 622. The railroad company set up the decree in its favor as a bar to the action. The homestead company replied: “That the decree or judgment referred to is null and void, for the reason that the courts of the United States had no jurisdiction of said suit, and no legal power or authority to render said decree or judgment.” The supreme court of Iowa held that the question of prior adjudication had not been properly raised before it, and decided the case without considering the point. This court held that the point was duly made, and that the Federal court had jurisdiction in the suit relied upon, and decided in 17 Wallace; and held further that the supreme court of Iowa, in refusing to give effect to the prior judgment as an estoppel, had denied to the navigation company the Federal right set up. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Waite said:

“As the circuit court entertained the suit, and this court, on appeal, impliedly recognized its right to do so, and proceeded to dispose of the case finally on its merits, certainly our decree cannot, in the light of prior adjudications on the same *general question, be[520] deemed a nullity. It was at the time of the trial in the present case in the court below a valid and subsisting prior adjudication of the matters in controversy, binding on these parties, and a bar to this action. In refusing to so decide the court failed to give full faith and credit to the decree of this court under which the navigation and railroad company claimed an immunity from all liability to the homestead company on account of the taxes sued for, and this was error.”

This reasoning is applicable here. The decree of the Federal court of 1898 gave judgment that the bank had a contract absolving it from all taxes, including those sued for. When the state court refused to give that judgment effect it denied a right secured by the Federal court judgment upon matters wherein its decision was final until reversed in an appellate court, or modified or set aside in the court of its rendition.

In our judgment the adjudication of the Federal court relied upon here, although based upon the judgment of a state court, given as a reason therefor, is equally effectual as it would have been had the Federal court reached the conclusion, as upon the original question, that the Hewitt law constituted a binding contract between the parties. Any other conclusion strikes down the very foundation of the doctrine of res judicata, and permits the state court to deprive a party of the benefit of its most important principle, and is a virtual abandonment of the final power of the Federal courts to protect all who come before them relying upon rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and established by the judgments of the Federal courts.

It is true that the final determination of the courts that the Hewitt law did not constitute a contract, and the reversal of the state court judgment which was the basis of the decree in the Federal court, renders this case one where a court might wish to avoid the application of rules which may seem technical. But the protection of the right of parties as well as the interest of the public to end litigation by a final judgment, and to preserve inviolate the safeguards of the Federal Constitution, should never be overlooked [521] in view of the hardship of particular *cases. And we repeat that we are not dealing with any right of relief which the state may have in the Federal court wherein the original decree was rendered.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Brewer, Mr. Justice Brown, and Mr. Justice Peckham, dissenting:

This was a petition in equity filed by defendant in error in the circuit court of Franklin county, Kentucky, seeking the recovery of certain taxes for the years 1893 and 1894, penalties and interest. To revise the judgment of the court of appeals of Kentucky rendered November 19, 1901, this writ of error was sued out, and the question is whether that court erred in declining to direct the Franklin circuit court to sustain a plea of former adjudication by the decree of the circuit court of the United States rendered June 25, 1898, in enforcement of a decree of the Franklin circuit court rendered in the same case February 1, 1896, and which was reversed by the state court of appeals, June 19, 1900.

The plea or supplemental answer was filed in the Franklin circuit court February 1, 1901, on the remanding of the case to that court. The case went off on other points, but, being again carried to the court of appeals, it was held that, as the taxes involved in this case were those for 1893 and 1894, and those involved in the case in the United States court were the taxes for 1895, 1896, 1897, and 1898, and as it was the settled law of Kentucky that an adjudication in respect of the taxes of one year was not a bar to recovery in litigation in respect of the taxes of another year, the decree of the United States circuit court, based on the reversed decree in this case, could not be treated as a bar to the collection of the taxes for 1893 and 1894, on the view that the thing adjudged was the existence of a contract created by the Hewitt law, which exempted the banks from liability [522] for such taxes during the lifetime of *their charters; and that to decide otherwise would be to hold that the prior decree in this case, though reversed, was nevertheless made binding by the decree of another jurisdiction rested upon it, as having determined the invalidity of taxes of other years, notwithstanding the law of the state to the contrary.

191 U. S.

And the court of appeals was fortified in its conclusion by the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States, the court of appeals, and the circuit court of the United States, in opinions delivered at the time of the rendition of the decree in question, had all held that the Hewitt law did not constitute an irrevocable contract.

The case before us stands in the same situation as if the Franklin circuit court had overruled the plea of former adjudication, and rendered decree for complainant, and the court of appeals had thereupon affirmed that decree; and it seems to me that the Franklin circuit court could not have done otherwise in view of the law of the state in respect of litigation as to taxes of different years.

Moreover, there is a distinction between estoppel by decree and estoppel by the findings on which the decree rests, in that the one operates as a bar to subsequent suits on the same cause of action, and the other to further litigation of the particular issuable facts found.

And I submit that the thing adjudged by the circuit court of the United States was not that the Hewitt law constituted a contract between the state and the banks, which exempted the banks from this taxation, but was that the board of councilmen was estopped to deny the alleged contract because of the decree of the Franklin circuit court. This is explicitly stated in the decree as the ground of the decree, and the decree could have rested on no other ground, as the suit was in effect a suit to enforce the state court decree, and, conceding the potency attributed to the doctrine of res judicata, the circuit court of the United States could not have exercised an original judgment on the question of contract or not, but was compelled *to accept the existence of the contract as "established" by the decree of the Franklin circuit court. [523]

I think it follows that when a decree rests on the establishment by a prior decree of a certain conclusion of law, such ground of the prior decree cannot be treated as merely reasons for the later decree, which, as mere reasons, may be ignored; and that this must necessarily be so when the court rendering the later decree is shut up to the single question of estoppel. This being so, I differ entirely from the view that the controversy in the Federal court was at large as to the force and effect of the Hewitt law as a contract exempting the banks from taxation not only for the specified years, but for all other years. The decree cannot be treated as giving to the Franklin circuit decree a wider scope than the law of the state allowed, and the law of the state was that the doctrine of res judicata is not applicable to taxes for years other than those under consideration in the particular case. See Union & Planters' Bank v. Memphis, 189 U. S. 71, 75, 47 L. ed. 712, 715, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604, and cases cited.

It is true that the decree of the United States circuit court enjoined the taxes involved in that suit, and also the taxes for subsequent years, but this was upon the express ground that the decree of the state circuit court had established a contract of exemption during the corporate existence of the bank; and whatever the terms of the latter decree, the state law permitted a renewal of the controversy in respect of taxes not directly involved. To apply the Federal decree to any other than the taxes enumerated is to hold that matters of public law can be placed by estoppel beyond the power of reconsideration,—a doctrine not heretofore favored by this court. Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302; Brownsville Taxing Dist. v. Loague, 129 U. S. 493, 32 L. ed. 780, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327; O'Brien v. Wheelock, 184 U. S. 450, 46 L. ed. 636, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354.

[524] It is the duty of the state courts as well as of the Federal courts to see to it that no act of a state legislature impairing the obligation of a contract is sustained, and it is the duty of the Federal courts as well as of the state courts to see to it that no act of a state legislature is avoided on the pretext of impairment *of the obligations of a contract, when in fact there is no contract to impair. Here this court and the highest court of the state of Kentucky agree that there is no contract, and yet a valid law of Kentucky is overthrown on the pretense of a contract which confessedly has no existence. The reason given is that the Federal court once held that there was a contract, when, in truth, that court held that there was no contract, but that defendant in error was estopped to assert that fact by reason of a judgment of the state court, which has since been duly vacated. The decision is, therefore, not based upon any provision of the Federal Constitution, but upon a rule of general law as to the conclusiveness of a judgment. But that rule of general law is, like any other, subject to modification or change by the state, and it is as true of Kentucky as of Tennessee that the rule of res judicata as applied to taxes does not embrace other taxes than those immediately in litigation. Repeated decisions of this court are that a Federal judgment is entitled to the same consideration as a state judgment, "no more and no less," and we held in Union & Planters' Bank v. Memphis that what effect a judgment of a state court shall have as res judicata is a question of state law.

In my judgment the state courts, in rendering decree for the taxes of 1893 and 1894, did not refuse to give the Federal decree such effect as it was entitled to.

Of course, I express no opinion as to the taxes for 1895-6-7 and 8; the immediate subject of the bill in the United States court. The situation of that case is peculiar. The decree of that court was affirmed in this court on appeal by an equal division, May 15, 1899. 174 U. S. 800, 43 L. ed. 1187, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881. Leave was subsequently granted by this court to appellants to apply to the circuit court for leave to file such bill as counsel might be advised. The present defendant in error (appellant there) accordingly applied to that court for leave to file a bill of review, which was denied. 120 Fed. 165. The case was then carried to the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit, and that court affirmed the order of the circuit court. *124 Fed. 18. The court stated [525] that the judgment of the Franklin circuit court rested on a former decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky, holding the revenue act of 1892 void as an impairment of the state's contract with the banks, and that, after the decree of the United States circuit court, the court of appeals of Kentucky overruled its former decision; and the United States court of appeals then held that the consequent reversal of the Franklin circuit judgment furnished no adequate ground for the revision of the decree of the United States circuit court.

The prior decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky was rendered June 1, 1895, and is reported 97 Ky. 590, 31 S. W. 1013. That decision was overruled by a decision rendered March 24, 1897, and reported 102 Ky. 174, 44 L. R. A. 825, 39 S. W. 1030, 44 S. W. 1131, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 248. The decree of the circuit court of the United States was rendered June 25, 1898. There were many cases under consideration in the state court of appeals, and it happened that the decree of the Franklin circuit court was not in fact reversed until June 19, 1900. But as the ground on which that decree rested had been swept away in 1897, the circuit court of the United States might well have applied the rule laid down by Lord Redesdale, that where a party comes into a court of equity to have the benefit of a former decree, the court is at liberty to inquire whether the circumstances justified the relief. Mitford, Pl. 96; 138 U. S. 561, 34 L. ed. 1008, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 405. This was not done, and the Federal decree has not, as yet, been set aside.

But Lord Redesdale's rule is applicable in this case, and that is in itself sufficient to require the affirmance of the judgment of the court of appeals of Kentucky.

My Brothers Brewer, Brown, and Peckham concur in this dissent.

v.

DUPLAN SILK COMPANY.

Appeal—review of judgment of circuit court of appeals—case arising under Federal law.

1. A case does not arise under the laws of the United States so as to deprive the judgment of the circuit court of appeals therein of that finality which exists when the jurisdiction of the circuit court depends entirely on diverse citizenship, unless it appears by plaintiff's pleading that the suit really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy as to the effect or construction of the Constitution, or validity or construction of the laws or treaties of the United States, upon the determination of which the result depends.
2. The removal from a state court to a Federal circuit court for diverse citizenship, of a suit by a trustee in bankruptcy for the conversion of property, the title to which vested in him by the adjudication in bankruptcy, places such suit in the Federal court as if it had been commenced there on that ground of jurisdiction, within the rule making the judgment of the circuit court of appeals final when the jurisdiction of the circuit court depends entirely on diverse citizenship, and not as if it had been commenced there by consent of defendant, under § 23 of the bankruptcy act.

Argued December 7, 1903. Decided December 21, 1903.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit to review a judgment which reversed the judgment of the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in favor of plaintiff in an action of trover brought by a trustee in bankruptcy, and remanded the case with instructions to enter judgment for defendant. Dismissed.

See same case below, 53 C. C. A. 321, 115 Fed. 689.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was an action of trover commenced by plaintiff in error in the court of common pleas for the county of Lehigh, Pennsylvania, October 18, 1900, the declaration averring in substance that on January 13, 1900, certain lumber and building materials were the property of the firm of Bennett & Rothrock, and that, by virtue of an adjudication in bankruptcy of that date, plaintiff succeeded to the title of that firm to said lumber and materials, and that on January 15, 1900, defendant in error wrongfully converted the lumber and materials to its own use.

NOTE.—As to Federal question as conferring jurisdiction on United States courts—see notes to Montana Ore-Purchasing Co. v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 35 C. C. A. 7; Bailey v. Mosher, 11 C. C. A. 308, and Re Buchanan, 39 L. ed. U. S. 884.

November 19, 1900, defendant in error presented its bond and petition for the removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the petition alleging that the controversy in the suit was wholly between citizens of different states; that the plaintiff, trustee in bankruptcy of Bennett & Rothrock, and Bennett & Rothrock themselves, were at the time of the commencement of the suit, and at the time the petition for removal was presented, citizens of the state of Pennsylvania; and that the defendant was at the time of the commencement of the suit, and at the time the petition for removal was presented, a citizen of New York; and thereupon the cause was removed. The cause having been docketed and the record filed, defendant filed a plea of not guilty, and a trial was had November 11, 1901, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff for $12,183. January 15, 1902, a motion by defendant for judgment non obstante veredicto was overruled and judgment entered in favor of plaintiff (112 Fed. 638), to review which defendant prosecuted a writ of error from the United States circuit court of appeals for the third circuit, and that court on May 7, 1902, reversed the judgment of the circuit court, and remanded the cause with instructions to enter judgment for defendant on the verdict. 53 C. C. A. 321, 115 Fed. 689. This writ of error was then allowed.

Mr. Thomas M. B. Hicks argued the cause, and, with Messrs. William H. Spencer and Clarence L. Peaslee, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Where a right is claimed by the plaintiff in a case which depends for its existence upon the construction to be given to a law of Congress a Federal question is involved, and the case arises under the laws of the United States.

The circumstance that there may also come in question other principles or matters unconnected with the Federal law does not interfere with the jurisdiction.

Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204.

Although the fact of diverse citizenship may have been the only jurisdictional ground expressly invoked, yet, if the existence of a Federal question appears on the record at the time the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States attaches, both grounds of jurisdiction actually exist and appear upon the record, and the judgment of the circuit courts of appeals is not final.

Northern P. R. Co. v. Soderberg, 188 U. S. 526, 47 L. ed. 575, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365; Union P. R. Co. v. Harris, 158 U. S. 326, 39 L. ed. 1003, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843; Huguley Mfg. Co. v. Galeton Cotton Mills, 184 U. S. 290, 46 L. ed. 546, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 452.

Where the suit by the trustee in bankruptcy against a stranger to the bankruptcy proceedings, aside from the mere fact of bankruptcy, involves Federal questions, which under the general judicature acts of Congress, give jurisdiction of the suit to the United States circuit courts, such jurisdiction is not withheld.

Bardes v. First Nat. Bank, 178 U. S. 524, 44 L. ed. 1175, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000.

For definition of the word "claim," see—

Webster, Internat. Diet.; Bouvier, Law Diet.; Rapalje & L. Law Diet.; Black, Law Diet.; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 539, 10 L. ed. 1060; Coster v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 413; United States v. Spaulding, 3 Dak. 93, 13 N. W. 357, 538; Pea v. Waggoner, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 1; Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 205; Robinson v. Wiley, 15 N. Y. 491; Lopez v. United States, 24 Ct. Cl. 95, 2 L. R. A. 571; Kansas use of Coates v. Ridenour, 84 Mo. 253; Howell v. Buffalo, 15 N. Y. 523.

Had this suit continued to be prosecuted under the state jurisdiction, and had the verdict of the jury been in favor of the plaintiff in error as was the verdict in the United States circuit court, and had the judgment thereon been reversed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania as it was in this case by the United States circuit court of appeals, a writ of error to remove the case to the Supreme Court of the United States would have been of right.

Williams v. Heard, 140 U. S. 529, 35 L. ed. 550, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 885; Dushane v. Beall, 161 U. S. 513, 40 L. ed. 791, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637; Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257; Talbot v. First Nat. Bank, 185 U. S. 172, 46 L. ed. 857, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612; Roby v. Colchour, 146 U. S. 153, 36 L. ed. 922, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47; Stanley v. Schwalby, 162 U. S. 255, 40 L. ed. 960, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 754.

Had this case taken its course in the state courts, and had the title and right as specially set up and claimed by the plaintiff in error been shown forth in the opinions of the courts of the state in the same manner that they are in the opinions of the lower United States courts, there can be no question but that such denial of the same, and decision against their validity, would have entitled the plaintiff in error to have removed the case to this court by writ of error.

The Supreme Court of the United States, even if of the opinion that it does not possess ordinary appellate jurisdiction in this case, may, because of the importance of the questions involved, treat this writ of error as a certiorari.

The validity of the bankruptcy act was in no wise questioned, and the case falls within the rule laid down in Cameron v. United States, 146 U. S. 533, 36 L. ed. 1077, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, that this court will not review a judgment of the highest court of a state in a case where no question is raised as to the validity of a statute of the United States, but merely the application of the statute to the facts of the case is involved.

Mr. Wm. Y. C. Anderson also argued the cause for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

In our opinion the jurisdiction of the circuit court depended entirely on diverse citizenship, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals was final, and the writ of error must be dismissed. Colorado Central Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 37 L. ed. 1030, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 35; Borgmeyer v. Idler, 159 U. S. 408, 40 L. ed. 199, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 34; Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, 164 U. S. 105, 41 L. ed. 367, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40.

The views expressed in the latter case will suffice to indicate the governing rules. In [528] that case the complaint in the circuit court showed that the parties were citizens of different states, and did not claim under the Constitution or laws of the United States. At the trial plaintiff relied wholly upon a common-law right, but defendant invoked the Constitution and laws of the United States. Judgment having passed for plaintiff, which was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, we dismissed a writ of error to that court on the ground that its judgment was made final by the statute. Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion, said:

"Of suits of a civil nature, at law or in equity, the circuit courts of the United States have original jurisdiction, by reason of the citizenship of the parties, in cases between citizens of different states or between citizens of a state and aliens; and by reason of the cause of action, 'in cases arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority,' including, of course, suits arising under the patent or copyright laws of the United States. Act of August 13, 1888, chap. 866, § 1 (25 Stat. at L. 433, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 508); Rev. Stat. § 629, cl. 9 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 504). In order to give the circuit court jurisdiction of a case as one arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, that it does so arise must appear from the plaintiff's own statement of his claim. Colorado Central Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 37 L. ed. 1030, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 35; Tennessee v. Union & P. Bank, 152 U. S. 454, 38 L. ed. 511, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 654; Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. v. Skottowe, 162 U. S. 490, 40 L. ed. 1048, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369; Hanford v. Davies, 163 U. S. 273, 41 L. ed. 157, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1051.

"From final judgments of the circuit court in civil suits an appeal or writ of error lies to this court, or to the circuit court of appeals. It lies directly to this court in any case in which the jurisdiction of the circuit court is in issue; and in such case the question of jurisdiction only is certified to and decided by this court. It also lies directly from the circuit court to this court in cases involving the construction or application of the Constitution, or the constitutionality of a law, or the validity or construction of a treaty, of the United States, or in which the Constitution or a law of a state is claimed to be in contravention *of the Constitution [529] of the United States; and in any of these cases the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not limited to the constitutional question, but extends to the determination of the whole case. Act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, § 5 (26 Stat. at L. 827, 828, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549); Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 570, 36 L. ed. 266, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522; Chappell v. United States, 160 U. S. 499, 40 L. ed. 510, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397.

"From final judgments of the circuit court in all other civil suits an appeal or writ of error lies to the circuit court of appeals; and the judgments rendered thereon by the circuit court of appeals are final (unless this court, by writ of certiorari or otherwise, orders the whole case to be brought up for its decision) in all cases in which the jurisdiction of the circuit court 'is dependent entirely upon the parties being aliens and citizens of the United States, or citizens of different states,' as well as in cases arising under the patent laws, or under the revenue laws. In all other civil actions (including those arising under the copyright laws of the United States), if the matter in controversy exceeds

$1,000, besides costs, there is, as of right, an appeal or writ of error to bring the case to this court. Act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, § 6.

"This plaintiff in error, having been defeated in the circuit court, did not bring the case directly to this court, as one involving the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States, or upon any other of the grounds specified in § 5 of the act of 1891. But it took the case, under § 6, to the circuit court of appeals, and, having been again defeated in that court, now claims, as of right, a review by this court of the judgment of the circuit court of appeals.

"The judgment of the circuit court of appeals being made final in all cases in which the jurisdiction of the circuit court is dependent entirely upon the parties being citizens of different states, but not final in cases arising under the copyright laws of the United States, where the matter in controversy exceeds $1,000, the test of the appellate jurisdiction of this court over the case at bar is whether it was one arising under the copyright laws of the United States, or [530] was one in which *the jurisdiction of the circuit court wholly depended upon the parties being citizens of different states.

"The complaint, alleging that the plaintiff was a citizen of Illinois and the defendant a citizen of New York, and claiming damages in a sum of more than $2,000, showed that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case by reason of the parties being citizens of different states. The plaintiff, in her complaint, did not claim any right under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or in any way mention or refer to that Constitution or to those laws; and, at the trial, she relied wholly upon a right given by the common law, and maintained her action upon such a right only. It was the defendant, and not the plaintiff, who invoked the Constitution and laws of the United States. This, as necessarily follows from the foregoing considerations, and as was expressly adjudged in Colorado Central Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 37 L. ed. 1030, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 35, is insufficient to support the jurisdiction of this court to review, by appeal or writ of error, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals.

"The jurisdiction of the circuit court having been obtained and exercised solely because of the parties being citizens of different states, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals was final, and the writ of error must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction."

In the present case it is contended that the jurisdiction was not dependent entirely on the opposite parties to the suit being citizens of different states, because the suit arose under the laws of the United States, and that, therefore, jurisdiction rested also on that ground. But a suit does not so arise unless it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy as to the effect or construction of the Constitution, or validity or construction of the laws or treaties of the United States, upon the determination of which the result depends, and which appears in the record by plaintiff's pleading. Arbuckle v. Blackburn, 191 U. S. 406, ante, 239, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ann Arbor R. Co. 178 U. S. 239, 44 L. ed. 1052, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867; Muse v. Arlington Hotel Co. 168 U. S. 430, 42 L. ed. 531, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109.

*Plaintiff's declaration set forth no mat-[531] ter raising any controversy under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. It is true that if the lumber and materials belonged to Bennett & Rothrock on January 13, 1900, plaintiff in error succeeded to the title of the firm on the adjudication; but the question of Bennett & Rothrock's ownership on that day in itself involved no Federal controversy, and the mere fact that plaintiff was trustee in bankruptcy did not give jurisdiction. Bardes v. First Nat. Bank, 178 U. S. 524, 44 L. ed. 1175, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000. Indeed, if the case had not been removed, and had gone to judgment in the court of common pleas, and that judgment had been affirmed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania on the same grounds as those on which the circuit court of appeals proceeded, a writ of error could not have been brought under § 709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 575), for the case would not have fallen within either of the classes enumerated in that section as the basis of our jurisdiction. The validity of the bankruptcy act was conceded, and no right specially set up or claimed under it was denied.

Section 23 of the bankruptcy law does not enable us to maintain jurisdiction. The first two clauses read (before the amendment of February 5, 1903 (32 Stat. at L. 797, chap. 487) as follows:

"Sec. 23a. The United States circuit courts shall have jurisdiction of all controversies at law and in equity, as distinguished from proceedings in bankruptcy, between trustees as such and adverse claimants concerning the property acquired or claimed by the trustees, in the same manner and to the same extent only as though bankruptcy proceedings had not been instituted, and such controversies had been between the bankrupts and such adverse claimants.

"b. Suits by the trustee shall only be brought or prosecuted in the courts where the bankrupt whose estate is being administered by such trustee might have brought or prosecuted them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, unless by consent of the proposed defendant." [30 Stat. at L. 552, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3431.]

[532] Plaintiff brought his action in the state court, and its removal *on the ground of diverse citizenship placed it in the circuit court as if it had been commenced there on that ground of jurisdiction, and not as if it had been commenced there by consent of defendant under § 23 of the bankruptcy act. The right to removal is absolute, and cannot be trammelled by such a consequence.

Nor can this writ of error be sustained under § 25 of the bankruptcy law, for the section has no application. The reasons for that conclusion will be found in Holden v. Stratton, 191 U. S. 115, ante, p. 116, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 45.

As to the suggestion that certiorari might now be issued, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals was rendered May 7, 1902, and there is nothing to take the case out of the general rule. The Conqueror, 166 U. S. 110, 114, 41 L. ed. 937, 939, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; Ayres v. Polsdorfer, 187 U. S. 585, 595, 47 L. ed. 314, 317, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196.

Writ of error dismissed.

Adverse possession—of lands within congressional land grant.

Adverse possession of land within the 10-mile limit of the grant to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, made by the act of Congress of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 120), as amended by the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 356, chap. 216), under a claim of right, and for the period prescribed by a state statute of limitations, transferred the title, although the patent to the railroad company in pursuance of such grant had not been issued.

Decided December 21, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Utah to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of the First Judicial District, Box Elder County, of that State, entered upon a verdict for defendants in a suit to quiet title. Affirmed.

See same case below, 24 Utah, 453, 67 Pac. 1123.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

The Toltec Ranch Company, a California corporation, brought this action in 1901 in the district court of the first judicial district, Box Elder county, state of Utah, to quiet title to the S.E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S.E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 27, township 8, north of range 2 west, Salt Lake meridian, United States survey. Title in fee was alleged. The defendants answered separately, *claiming different portions of the[533] land, and each alleged peaceable, continuous, and adverse possession under claim of title in himself and grantors adversely to the plaintiff for more than thirty years, and that plaintiff's cause was "barred by the statute of limitations as provided by §§ 2856 and 2872 inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of Utah." Under these sections to constitute a bar there must be an adverse holding for at least seven years.

The title of plaintiff, it was admitted, was derived as follows: Patent from the United States dated January 20, 1900, to the Central Pacific Railroad Company; the railroad company by deed dated October 17, 1895, to D. P. Tarpey; the latter and wife to M. F. Tarpey by deed December 8, 1895; M. F. Tarpey to plaintiff, October 17, 1896. The patent to the company was issued in pursuance of the grant to the company made by the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, as amended by the act of July 2, 1864, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri to the Pacific ocean. 12 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 120; 13 Stat. at L. 356, chap. 216.

It was admitted that the land in controversy was within the 10 mile limit of the grant to the company, and that the map of location of the railroad was filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior on the 20th of October, 1868.

It was also admitted that no claim of any right or title to or in the right of way of the railroad company across the lands in controversy was made by any or either of the defendants.

The defendants introduced evidence to sustain the averments of their answers.

The case was submitted to a jury on special interrogatories, and the jury found that the defendants had been in possession of the land claimed by them, either by themselves or their predecessors and grantors, from some time in 1868 to the commencement of the action. The jury also returned the following verdict: "We, the jury empaneled in the above-entitled cause, find the issues joined herein in favor of the said defendants and against the plaintiff, no cause of action." *Judgment was entered upon the verdict. It[534] was affirmed by the supreme court of the state. The court said, after discussing questions with which we are not concerned:

"The next question for consideration is whether the statute of limitations can prevail as a bar to the action when it appears that the patent of the United States government was not issued to the plaintiff until January 20, 1900." [24 Utah, 453, 67 Pac. 1123.]

The question was answered in the affirmative. The chief justice of the state granted this writ of error.

Mr. Maxwell Evarts argued the cause, and, with Messrs. T. D. Johnson and Lindsay R. Rogers, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The legal title to the land remained in the government until the patent was issued.

Under the Pacific land grants the title to the land granted remained in the United States until the cost of survey had been paid; and there is no evidence in the present case that the cost of survey has been paid, or that the land was ever surveyed.

Certain conditions in the grants of Congress to the Pacific railroads have since been recognized, and certain exceptions contained in such grants have been given effect by the decisions of this court which may be said to limit the broad scope which might be inferred from the language used in the case of Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 142 U. S. 241, 35 L. ed. 999, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158.

Smith*, 95 Cal. 154, 30 Pac. 200.

Mr. Justice McKenna, after stating the case as above, delivered the opinion of the court:

The case is in narrow compass. The question presented is whether adverse possession under claim of right for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations of Utah before patent was issued by the United States can prevail against the latter. It has been decided by this court that adverse possession of land gives title to it and all of the remedies which attach to the *title. This was [538] expressly ruled in Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 533, 36 L. ed. 532, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720. The suit was a bill in equity to establish, as matter of record, a title acquired by adverse possession, and it was brought against those who, but for such acquisition, would have been the owners. Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

"It is now well settled that by adverse possession for the period designated by the statute, not only is the remedy of the former owner gone, but his title has passed to the occupant, so that the latter can maintain ejectment for the possession against such former owner should he intrude upon the premises. In several of the states this doctrine has become a positive rule by their statutes of limitations declaring that uninterrupted possession for the period designated to bar an action for the recovery of land shall of itself constitute a complete title. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, 599, 17 L. ed. 261; Campbell v. Holt, 115 U. S. 620, 623, 29 L. ed. 483, 485, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209." See also Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. 361, 6 L. ed. 495.

Adverse possession, therefore, may be said to transfer the title as effectually as a conveyance from the owner; it may be considered as tantamount to a conveyance. And the Central Pacific Railroad Company had the title. Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 142 U. S. 241, 35 L. ed. 999, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158. It would seem, therefore, an irresistible conclusion that it could have been transferred by any of the means which the law provided. It is, however, contended otherwise, and Ankeny v. Clark, 148 U. S. 345, 37 L. ed. 475, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Barden v. Northern P. R. Co. 154 U. S. 288, 38 L. ed. 992, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030, and Nelson v. Northern P. R. Co. 188 U. S. 108, 47 L. ed. 406, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 302, are urged to support the contention. A comparison of those cases with Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey becomes necessary.

Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey was an action of ejectment. Tarpey was the plaintiff in the trial court. He relied for his title upon a lease from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and it became necessary to consider the nature of the congressional grant to that company. The issue made was direct and unmistakable, and the decision was equally so. The plaintiff contended that the grant vested in the company the legal title. It was asserted on the other hand that the [539] title to the land was *retained until the cost of selecting, surveying, and conveying all the granted lands was paid, and, also, that by other provisions of the granting act the title remained in the government until patent issued. Both contentions were rejected. The court said that the terms of the grant "import the transfer of a present title, not one to be made in the future. They are that 'there be and is hereby granted' to the company every alternate section of the lands. No partial or limited interest is designated, but the lands themselves are granted, as they are described by the sections mentioned. Whatever interest the United States possessed in the lands was covered by those terms, unless they were qualified by subsequent provisions, a position to be presently considered." Those provisions were considered, and it was determined that they did not qualify the terms of the grant conveying the title, or essentially limit them. Anticipating the question that, if such be the import of the act, what was the necessity of patents, it was said, there were many reasons why the issue of patents would be of great service to the patentees. "While not essential to transfer the legal right, the patents would be evidence that the grantee had complied with the conditions of the grant, and to that extent the grant was relieved from the possibility of forfeiture for breach of its conditions, . . . they would thus be in the grantee's hands deeds of further assurance of his title, and therefore a source of quiet and peace to him in his possession." And the conclusion was that "the title transferred was a legal title, as distinguished from an equitable and inchoate interest." The distinction expressed the completeness of the title conveyed.

Ankeny v. Clark was an action for the recovery of the value of 12,767 bushels of wheat, which had been delivered by Clark to Ankeny in pursuance of a contract by which Ankeny agreed to sell and deliver to Clark two sections of land in Walla Walla county, in what was then the territory of Washington. After the delivery of the wheat Clark demanded a deed for the land. Ankeny, after some delay on one pretext or another, informed Clark that he could have a warranty deed to a part of the land, *and a quitclaim [540] deed to the part which was called railroad land, and informed him, as to the latter part, that if the Northern Pacific Railroad Company could not get title he would be obliged to procure title from the government. Ankeny promised to pay the necessary expenses of obtaining title in that way. Clark refused the offer, and gave notice that, unless a good title was conveyed to him for the whole of the land within five days, he would abandon possession, and claim compensation for the violation of the contract. Ankeny paid no attention to the notice, and Clark brought suit for the value of the wheat, and recovered. The case came to this court from the supreme court of the territory. In passing on the case this court said there were three principal matters of contention in the trial court. We are concerned with only one of them, and that is, "Did Ankeny have a good title to the northeast quarter of section 19, being part and parcel of the lands which he agreed to sell to Clark?" Clark asserted the negative of the question; Ankeny contended for the affirmative, and cited Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey. The court did not find it necessary to decide the issue thus accurately presented. It followed Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, to the effect that the government could enforce the payment of the costs, and could withhold the patents until they were paid; and this, it was said, "gave the government a lien for said costs." And it was hence held that Ankeny "did not hold such a title as it was obligatory on the plaintiff [Clark] to accept." But Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey was not questioned. It was only decided that the land was subject to a lien, and, so burdened, Clark was not compelled to receive it.

Barden v. Northern P. R. Co. 154 U. S. 288, 38 L. ed. 992, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030, was an action by the railroad company for the recovery of certain lands containing veins or lodes of rock in place bearing gold, silver, and other precious metals. The plaintiff relied for title upon its grant. The defendant contended that the lands were excepted by [541] express words from the grant. This contention was sustained. It is manifest, therefore, that the ease in no way militates with the decision in Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, and the *court said so. Mr. Justice Field was the organ of the court in both cases, and he expressed the inapplicability of the Tarpey Case and left it unimpaired. What was there said was affirmed,—that the title passed at the date of the grant. Of what lands? Of those, it was held, which were not reserved as mineral. In other words, mineral lands were not conveyed, whether known or unknown to be such at the time of the grant. This was the main question decided. It was also held that the issue of patent would constitute a determination of the character of the land by reason of the power of the Land Department to determine and establish it. But it was not intimated, nor does it follow, that the conveyance of the title to the company was by the patent, and not by the granting act. There was, therefore, nothing decided which detracts from Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey.

Nelson v. Northern P. R. Co. was an action brought by the railway company to recover the possession of a quarter section of land claimed to be within the land grant of Northern Pacific Railroad, and the company held a patent. Nelson claimed to have settled upon the land three years before the definite location of the road. He claimed, therefore, to be within the exceptions of the grant. The land, when he settled upon it, was unsurveyed, and the effect of this constituted one of the questions in the case. Upon the filing of a map by the railroad company of its general route, an order was made by the Land Department withdrawing from settlement the lands within the limits of the grant. The effect of this order was another question in the case. It was held "that the railroad company did not acquire any vested interest in the land in dispute in virtue of its map of general route, or the withdrawal order based on such map," and it was further held that Nelson's settlement upon, and occupancy of, the land was valid, and constituted a claim upon the land within the meaning of the Northern Pacific act of 1864. In other words, it was held that the land was excluded from the grant by express words. The operative words which produced that effect were expressed in the following provision of [542] § 3 of the act: "And whenever *prior to said time [of definite location] any of said sections or parts of sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or pre-empted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof," etc. [13 Stat. at L. 368, chap. 217.] This view was established in an elaborate opinion. The case, therefore, like Barden v. Northern P. R. Co., decided only that lands did not pass by the grant which were reserved from it. An evident proposition, whatever might have been the difficulties in determining what lands were reserved. And there were difficulties. This court in consequence divided in opinion. But those difficulties do not confront us in the case at bar. They are settled, and in their settlement no doubts were cast upon the efficacy of the grants to convey title to all the lands they covered,—to all that was not reserved from them.

Judgment affirmed.

TOLTEC RANCH COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

WILLIAM BABCOCK and Louisa Babcock.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 542-544.)

Adverse possession — of lands within congressional land grant.

This case is governed by the decision in Toltec Ranch Co. v. Cook, ante, 291.

[No. 49.]

Argued and submitted November 3, 1903.

Decided December 21, 1903.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Utah to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of the First Judicial District, Box Elder County, of that State, entered upon a verdict for defendants in a suit to recover the possession of certain lands. Affirmed.

See same case below, 24 Utah, 183, 66 Pac. 876.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Maxwell Evarts argued the cause, and, with Messrs. T. D. Johnson and Lindsay R. Rogers, filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. B. H. Jones submitted the cause for defendants in error.

For contentions of counsel see their briefs as reported in Toltec Ranch Co. v. Cook, ante, 291.

*Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the [543] opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error is a corporation, and brought this action in 1899 in the district court of the first judicial district of the state of Utah, county of Box Elder, for the recovery of the possession of 64 acres of land in section 17, township 11, north of range 2 west. The plaintiff alleged title in fee. The answer alleged that defendant, William Babcock, held the land as agent of his wife, Louisa Babcock, who settled upon it as a homesteader, having the qualifications thereof, in 1867, erected improvements of the value of $1,500, and that the land was reserved from the grant of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The answer also alleged continuous adverse possession for thirty years under the statutes of Utah. The replication admitted Louisa Babcock had been in exclusive possession for thirty years, neither admitted nor denied that the land was within the grant to the railroad company, denied the value of the improvements, and denied also that the action was barred by the sections of the statute of limitations cited by the defendant's answer.

Louisa Babcock intervened. She denied the allegations of the plaintiff, set up her settlement as a homesteader and the rights acquired by exclusive and adverse possession under §§ 2858 to 2872, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of Utah. She also alleged that "on the 5th day of September, 1896, under a mistake, and entirely without authority of law, a patent of the United States was issued purporting to convey to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, under the acts of Congress granting lands to the Pacific railroads, the lands in controversy." And she prayed that "said patent be annulled and set aside, and for such other and further relief as may be just."

The plaintiff, answering the complaint in intervention, admitted the issuance of the patent, but denied all other allegations.

[544] There was also an action brought by the Toltec Company *against Babcock for hay and alfalfa seed alleged to have been grown upon the land. The answer raised the issues presented in the ejectment case.

The plaintiff depended for title upon a patent issued to the Central Pacific Railroad Company the 5th of September, 1896, in pursuance of the acts of Congress of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864 (12 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 120; 13 Stat. at L. 356, chap. 216), and a conveyance from the company to it by deed dated November 4, 1897. Against this title adverse possession was claimed as we have seen.

The cases were tried together and to a jury, which found "the issues in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff, 'no cause of action.'" Judgment was entered for defendants. It was affirmed by the supreme court of the state on appeal. 24 Utah, 183, 66 Pac. 876.

The court concluded its opinion as follows: "From the foregoing considerations, and from a careful examination of the proof, we are of the opinion that the intervenor is entitled to hold the land in controversy, and the crops raised thereon, by adverse possession, and that, as against the plaintiff, she has the absolute title thereto. We see nothing in the record which justifies a reversal. The judgment is affirmed, with costs."

This writ of error was allowed by the chief justice of Utah. It presents the same questions which have been decided in Toltec Ranch Co. v. Cook, 191 U. S. 532, ante, 291, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 166. On the authority of that case, therefore, the judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Brewer concurs in the judgment.

UNITED STATES.

Navy personnel act—credit of service for computing pay—prospective effect.

A credit of service for the purpose of computing future pay only, and not for the readjustment of past compensation, must be deemed intended by the proviso in the Navy personnel act of March 3, 1899, § 13 (30 Stat. at L. 1004, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1072), that all officers who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life shall, on the date of appointment, be credited, "for computing their pay" with five years' service, in view of the declared purpose for which such credit is given, and of the provision in the first clause of the statute, which makes increased pay begin with the next fiscal year.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the court of claims dismissing the petition of the claimant. Upon hearing, that court made the following findings of fact:

"I. The claimant, Ulysses S. G. White, was, on the 9th day of January, in the year 1877, appointed a civil engineer in the Navy from civil life. He remained such civil engineer and was such at the time of the passage of the Navy personnel act of March 3, 1899.

"II. The claimant, by reason of service in the Army, amounting to six years, seven months, and twenty-one days, previous to his entry into the Navy, reached the maximum pay of his grade, $3,500, May 19, 1885, under Revised Statutes, §§ 1478, 1556 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1033, 1067). Thus the amount of pay received by him between the 9th of January, 1877, and the 19th of May, 1885, was as follows:

Three years and 130 days, at $2,-

700 per annum.....	$9,061 64
Five years, at $3,000 per annum.....	15,000 00

Total	$24,061 64
-------------	-------------

"If he were, upon the date of his appointment, credited, for computing his pay, with five years' service, and entitled to be paid from that date, he would receive pay at the following rates:

Three years and 130 days, at $3,-

000 per annum.....	$10,068 49
Five years, at $3,500 per annum.....	17,500 00

—or $3,506.85 more than he has previously received."

The claim arises under the act of March 3, 1899, commonly *known as the Navy personnel act. The act is entitled "Chapter 413. An Act to Reorganize and Increase the Efficiency of the Personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States." 30 Stat.

at L. 1004 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1072). Section 13 of the act provides:

"That after June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine, commissioned officers of the line of the Navy and of the Medical and Pay Corps shall receive the same pay and allowances, except forage, as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for the officers of corresponding rank in the Army: Provided, That such officers when on shore shall receive the allowances, but fifteen per centum less pay than when on sea duty; but this provision shall not apply to warrant officers commissioned under section twelve of this act: Provided further, That when naval officers are detailed for shore duty beyond seas they shall receive the same pay and allowances as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for officers of the Army detailed for duty in similar places: Provided further, That naval chaplains who do not possess relative rank shall have the rank of lieutenant in the Navy; and that all officers, including warrant officers, who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life shall, on the date of appointment, be credited, for computing their pay, with five years' service. And all provisions of law authorizing the distribution among captors of the whole or any portion of the proceeds of vessels, or any property hereafter captured, condemned as prize, or providing for the payment of bounty for the sinking or destruction of vessels of the enemy hereafter occurring in time of war, are hereby repealed: And provided further, That no provision of this act shall operate to reduce the present pay of any commissioned officer now in the Navy; and in any case in which the pay of such an officer would otherwise be reduced he shall continue to receive pay according to existing law: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall operate to increase or reduce the pay of any officer now on the retired list of the Navy."

[550] The part of the statute particularly under consideration in *this case, and upon the interpretation of which the right of the claimant depends, is contained in the 3d paragraph: "And that all officers, including warrant officers, who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life, shall, on the date of appointment, be credited, for computing their pay, with five years' service."

It is the contention of the claimant that he comes within the terms of this proviso, and, as an officer appointed to the Navy from civil life, is entitled, as of the date of his appointment, to be credited with five years' service, having been appointed January 9, 1877, and by previous service in the Army entitled, under another statute (22

Stat. at L. 473, chap. 97, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1071), to a credit of six years, seven months, and twenty-one days, reaching the maximum pay of $3,500.00 on May 19, 1885.

The reading of the statute is not altogether clear, and we are to arrive at the meaning of Congress by such aids as may be legitimately resorted to in order to determine the effect and purpose of the lawmaking power in the language used. The statute is part of a voluminous act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States. In the title, the language used looks to the future; it contemplates a readjustment of rank and pay. It is true that the title of the act may not control the plain language of the enacting clauses, but, nevertheless, we may look to the declared scope and purpose of the act as evidenced by its title whenever it becomes necessary, in view of the use of language incapable by itself of exact construction. Church of Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 462, 36 L. ed. 226-229, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 511.

Chief Justice Marshall, in United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358-386, 2 L. ed. 304-313, said:

"Where the intent is plain, nothing is left to construction. Where the mind labors to discover the design of the legislature, it seizes everything from which aid can be derived; and, in such case, the title claims a degree of notice, and will have its due share of consideration." Coosaw Min. Co. v. South Carolina, 144 U. S. 563, 36 L. ed. 542, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689; Church of Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U. S. 462, 36 L. ed. 229, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 511.

*The part of the statute relied upon by the[551] claimant is incorporated by means of a proviso. Through the diligence of the learned counsel representing the claimant, it is exhibited in the appendix to their brief, that in this statute as originally reported, § 16 of the Navy personnel act (H. R. 10,403, 53d Congress, 3d session), there was no such proviso. As reported in the Senate, January 1, 1899, the first proviso was added. The other provisos were added as the bill was reported to the Senate, February 2, 1899, and included the one now under consideration; and it is argued that not only does this proviso contain independent matter, but that it was introduced into the bill and intended to be enacted as such. It is undoubtedly true that in congressional legislation provisos have been included in statutes which are really independent pieces of legislation; but this is a misuse of the usual purpose and effect of a proviso, which is to make exception from the enacting clause to restrain generality, and to prevent misinterpretation. Minis v. United States, 15 Pet. 423, 10 L. ed. 791. If possible, the act is to be given such construction as will permit both the enacting clause and the proviso to stand and be construed together with a view to carry into effect the whole purpose of the law. 1 Kent, Com. 463. The purview of the act and the words of the proviso must be reconciled if may be, and the operation of the proviso may be limited by the scope of the enacting clause. The object of interpretation being to ascertain the purpose of the lawmakers as expressed in the terms used in the law, we have a right to look to other laws upon the same subject-matter, and to consider the purpose intended to be carried into effect by the operation of the new law considered with the old, and as a part of a general provision. It is true that if the language used is free from ambiguity it is the best evidence of the thing intended, and it is the duty of the courts to find, if possible, within the four corners of the act, and from the language used, the scope and meaning of the law. Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 671, 32 L. ed. 1063, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 651. It is equally true that it is the business of [552] courts to decide what the law is, *and not, by consideration or surmises as to the policy of the government, have the effect to adjudge that to be law which has not been so enacted by the legislature. Dewey v. United States, 178 U. S. 521, 44 L. ed. 1174, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 981. But, after all, the main purpose of interpretation is to ascertain and carry into effect the object and purpose of the legislature in making the given law as expressed in the language used. Where it is claimed that a law is to have a retrospective operation, such must be clearly the intention, evidenced in the law and its purposes, or the court will presume that the lawmaking power is acting for the future only, and not for the past; that it is enacting a rule of conduct which shall control the future rights and dealings of men, rather than review and affix new obligations to that which has been done in the past. While it is undoubtedly within the power of Congress to provide for bounties or gratuities to those in the naval or military service of the United States, we should hardly look for such legislation in an act having the declared purpose and scope of the one now under consideration. Retrospective legislation is not favored. Cooley, Const. Lim. 529. Retrospective laws which have been sustained in the courts have ordinarily had the effect to remedy irregularities in legal procedure, assessment of property for taxation, and the like. Cooley, Const. Lim. 530, 531.

But it is urged that the plain meaning of this statute includes officers in the situation of the claimant, and requires a readjustment of their pay for years past. The language used is "all officers that have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life," and it is claimed that unless this construction is given to the act, violence is done to its terms, and to the rights intended to be conferred upon the claimant and other officers similarly situated. The proviso directs credit on the date of appointment. It is argued that this means as of the date of appointment. If this be true, it is in conflict with the first clause of the act, which makes increased pay begin on June 30th. The effect of this construction of the proviso, when read with the first clause of the act, is thus pertinently *pointed out in the ma-[553]jority opinion of the court of claims:

"The subject-matter of the proviso in question pertains to the rank of chaplains and to the basis for computing the pay of 'all officers, including warrant officers, who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life;' and the purview or body of the section refers to the pay of 'commissioned officers of the line of the Navy and of the Medical and Pay Corps,' many of whom—nearly all from the Medical Corps—were appointed from civil life, while the chaplains, the majority of the professors of mathematics, nearly all the civil engineers, and other officers were appointed from civil life.

"So that the language of the proviso 'all officers . . . who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life' clearly includes those officers mentioned in the body of the section who were appointed from civil life.

"If, therefore, the claimant's contention should prevail, those officers so appointed whose pay was increased after June 30, 1899, by assimilation to Army pay, would, in addition thereto, be entitled to receive from the date of appointment a gratuity of five years' additional pay, thereby fixing in the same section two distinct dates for the beginning of the pay of the same officers." [37 Ct. Cl. 381.]

But quite as important, in our view, is the declared purpose for which the credit is to be given "computing their pay." Does it not do violence to this expression of purpose to give the law a retrospective effect? The purpose for which the five years' service is to be credited cannot be ignored. It is thus that the object of the act is to be accomplished, and it is not declared to be with a view of readjusting the pay of officers within the classes named, or giving to them, as Congress might, a gratuity for past services, but the credit is solely given for the purpose of "computing their pay," and this is to be read in the light of the purview of the statute wherein its operation is declared to be effective from the beginning of the coming fiscal year.

[554] *But it is said that the declared policy of the act includes not only those to be hereafter appointed, but also those who have been appointed to the Navy from civil life. It will be presumed that Congress, in passing this legislation, had in mind the law already in force regulating the subject, and we find in § 1556 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1068), that civil engineers in the Navy are to be paid according to the length of their service, with increase of pay through three periods of five years each, and after fifteen years of service they are to receive the maximum amount of pay. If the act under consideration is to be read, as we think it should be, to have reference to the pay of naval officers beginning with the next fiscal year "on and after June thirtieth," it would increase the pay of those who had not reached the maximum pay by continuous service by giving to such officers, for the purpose of computing their pay thereafter, a credit for the five years' service or so much thereof as would enable such officer to reach the maximum pay. This construction gives force to the declared purpose of the act to begin its operation at the beginning of the coming fiscal year, and benefits those officers named in the proviso who have not already, by continuous service, been advanced in pay to the maximum compensation fixed by law. Congress must be presumed to have had before it, in framing this legislation, the statute already in force, fixing the pay of naval officers by advancing them every five years through three such periods to maximum pay. It enacted, in the statute under consideration, that the officers named, appointed or to be appointed from civil life, should have such credit on the date of appointment for one purpose,—“computing their pay.” In the light of the operation of the act as declared in the first clause to begin on the 30th of June following, we think this was meant, so far as it applied to officers theretofore appointed, and who were not receiving maximum pay, to give them a credit of the term of five years' advancement toward full pay for the purpose of computing compensation after the beginning of the coming fiscal year.

[555] *While the question is not free from difficulty, we cannot escape the conclusion that had Congress intended that this credit should be given not only for the purpose of computing future pay, but with a view to readjusting past compensation, and giving gratuities for years past, it would have declared its purpose in more distinct terms.

The construction here given is consistent with the declared purpose of the act; it gives to the law a future, not a retrospective, operation, and, in our judgment, carries out the expressed purpose of Congress in passing the law.

Amicus curiæ—leave to file briefs.

Leave to file briefs in a pending case as amicus curiæ will be denied where it does not appear that the applicant is interested in any other case which will be affected by the decision, and the parties are represented by competent counsel, whose consent has not been secured.

Submitted November 16, 1903. Decided November 30, 1903.

MOTION for leave to file briefs as amicus curiæ in a case pending on appeal from the United States Circuit Court for the District of Minnesota. Denied.

Mr. A. A. Hoehling, Jr., for the motion.

The Chief Justice: In support of this motion certain letters were presented showing that request was made of counsel for the respective parties for their consent to the application, and that they withheld direct consent, leaving the matter entirely to the court to determine. When the motion was submitted, objection to the granting of leave was made by counsel for appellees.

Where, in a pending case, application to file briefs is made by counsel not employed therein, but interested in some other *pend-[556] ing case involving similar questions, and consent is given, the court has always exercised great liberality in permitting this to be done. And doubtless it is within our discretion to allow it in any case when justified by the circumstances. Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 17, 5 L. ed. 551; Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 491, 15 L. ed. 188; The Gray Jack-ct, 5 Wall. 370, 18 L. ed. 646. It does not appear that applicant is interested in any other case which will be affected by the decision of this case; as the parties are represented by competent counsel, the need of assistance cannot be assumed and consent has not been given.

Leave to file must, therefore, be denied.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS, United States Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York.

Immigration—Porto Rican not an alien.

A native of Porto Rico who was an inhabitant of that island at the time of its cession to the United States by the treaty of April 11, 1899 (30 Stat. at L. 1754), with Spain, is not, upon her arrival at the port of New York, an alien immigrant, within the meaning of the act of Congress of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 1084, chap. 551, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1294, 1296), providing for the detention and deportation of alien immigrants likely to become public charges.

Argued December 4, 7, 1903. Decided January, 4, 1904.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review an order dismissing a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the detention by the immigration commissioner of a native of Porto Rico at the port of New York as an alien immigrant. Reversed and remanded, with directions to discharge the immigrant.

Most of the rights of citizenship are under the protection of the states themselves. In the view of a majority of the court in Downs v. Bidwell, 182 U. S. 312, 45 L. ed. 1116, 21 Sup. Ct. The court has sustained in the broadest terms the sovereign right of the nation to exclude aliens, the authority of Congress to enact such laws to carry into effect this sovereign right and the national will and policy, and has noted the purpose and motive of the laws.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by Isabella Gonzales from an order of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, dismissing a writ of habeas corpus issued on her behalf, and remanding her to the custody of the United States Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York. 118 Fed. 941.

Isabella Gonzales, an unmarried woman, was born and resided in Porto Rico, and was an inhabitant thereof on April 11, 1899, the date of the proclamation of the Treaty of Paris (30 Stat. at L. 1754). She arrived at the Port of New York from Porto Rico August 24, 1902, when she was prevented from landing, and detained by the Immigration Commissioner at that port as an "alien immigrant," in order that she might be returned to Porto Rico if it appeared that she was likely to become a public charge.

If she was not an alien immigrant within the intent and meaning of the act of Congress entitled "An Act in Amendment to the Various Acts Relative to Immigration and the Importation of Aliens under Contract or Agreement to Perform Labor," approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 1084, chap. 551, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1294, 1296), the commissioner had no power to detain or deport her, and the final order of the circuit court must be reversed.

The act referred to contains these provisions:

"That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States, in accordance with the *existing acts regulating immigration, other than those concerning Chinese laborers: All idiots, insane persons, paupers, or persons likely to become a public charge. . . .

"Sec. 8. That, upon the arrival by water at any place within the United States of any alien immigrants it shall be the duty of the commanding officer and the agents of the steam or sailing vessel by which they came to report the name, nationality, last residence, and destination of every such alien, before any of them are landed, to the proper inspection officers. . . . All decisions made by the inspection officers or their assistants touching the right of any alien to land, when adverse to such right, shall be final, unless appeal be taken to the Superintendent of Immigration, whose action shall be subject to review by the Secretary of the Treasury. It shall be the duty of the aforesaid officers and agents of such vessel to adopt due precautions to prevent the landing of any alien immigrant at any place or time other than that designated by the inspection officers, and any such officer or agent or person in charge of such vessel who shall either knowingly or negligently land, or permit to land, any alien immigrant at any place or time other than that designated by the inspection officers, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ."

"Sec. 10. That all aliens who may unlawfully come to the United States shall, if practicable, be immediately sent back on the vessel by which they were brought in. . . ."

"Sec. 11. That any alien who shall come into the United States in violation of law may be returned as by law provided, . . ."

The treaty ceding Porto Rico to the United States was ratified by the Senate February 6, 1899; Congress passed an act to carry out its obligations March 2, 1899 (30 Stat. at L. 993, chap. 376), and the ratifications were exchanged and the treaty proclaimed April 11, 1899 (30 Stat. at L. 1754). Then followed the act entitled "An Act Temporarily to Provide Revenues and a Civil Government for Porto Rico, and for Other Purposes," approved April 12, 1900. 31 Stat. at L. 77, chap. 191. The treaty provided:

*"Article II.

[9]

"Spain cedes to the United States the island of Porto Rico and other islands now under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies, and the island of Guam in the Marianas or Ladrones.

"Article III.

"Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine islands, and comprehending the islands lying within the following line. . . ."

"Article IX.

"Spanish subjects, natives of the Peninsula, residing in the territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, may remain in such territory or may remove therefrom, retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the right to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds;

and they shall also have the right to carry on their industry, commerce, and professions, being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners. In case they remain in the territory they may preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain by making, before a court of record, within a year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, a declaration of their decision to preserve such allegiance; in default of which declaration they shall be held to have renounced it, and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside.

"The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress."

By the Constitution of the Spanish monarchy and the Spanish Civil Code, in force in Porto Rico when the treaty was proclaimed, persons born in Spanish territory were declared to be Spaniards, but Porto Ricans who were not natives of the Peninsula, remaining in Porto Rico, could not, according to the terms of the treaty, elect to retain their allegiance to Spain. By the cession their allegiance became due to [10] the United States, which was in possession and had assumed the government, and they became entitled to its protection. The nationality of the island became American instead of Spanish, and, by the treaty, Peninsulars, not deciding to preserve their allegiance to Spain, were to be "held to have renounced it, and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside."

Thereupon Congress passed the act of April 12, 1900. That act created a civil government for Porto Rico, with a governor, secretary, attorney general, and other officers, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who, together with five other persons, likewise so appointed and confirmed, were constituted an executive council, at least five of whom should be "native inhabitants of Porto Rico;" and local legislative powers were vested in a legislative assembly, consisting of the executive council and a house of delegates to be elected.

The attorney general, the treasurer, the auditor, the commissioner of the interior, the commissioner of education were to make report through the governor to the Attorney General of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and so on, to be transmitted to Congress; and all laws enacted by the legislative assembly were to be reported to Congress, which reserved the power to annul the same.

Courts were provided for, and, among other things, Porto Rico was constituted a judicial district, with a district judge, attorney, and marshal, to be appointed by the President for the term of four years. The district court was to be called the district court of the United States for Porto Rico, and to possess, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction of district courts of the United States, jurisdiction of all cases cognizable in the circuit courts of the United States. And writs of error and appeals might be brought and taken from and to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Provision was also made for the election of a commissioner to the United States, to be paid a salary by the United States, *but [11] no person was eligible to such election "who is not a bona fide citizen of Porto Rico, who is not thirty years of age, and who does not read and write the English language."

By § 9 regulations were to be made "for the nationalization of all vessels owned by the inhabitants of Porto Rico;" by § 14 the statutes of the United States were generally put in force in the island; by § 16 judicial process was to run in the name of the President of the United States.

By § 7 the inhabitants of Porto Rico, who were Spanish subjects on the day the treaty was proclaimed, including Spaniards of the Peninsula who had not elected to preserve their allegiance to the Spanish Crown, were to be deemed citizens of Porto Rico, and they and citizens of the United States residing in Porto Rico were constituted a body politic under the name of The People of Porto Rico.†

*Gonzales was a native inhabitant of Porto Rico and a Spanish subject, though not [12]

†Sections 7, 9, 14, and 16 were as follows:

"Sec. 7. That all inhabitants continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then resided in Porto Rico, and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed and held to be citizens of Porto Rico, and as such entitled to the protection of the United States, except such as shall have elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain on or before the 11th day of April, 1900, in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain entered into on the 11th day of April, 1899; and they, together with such citizens of the United States as may reside in Porto Rico, shall constitute a body politic under the name of the The People of Porto Rico, with governmental powers as hereinafter conferred, and with power to sue and be sued as such."

"Sec. 9. That the Commissioner of Navigation shall make such regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as he may deem expedient for the nationalization of all vessels owned by the inhabitants of Porto Rico on the 11th day of April, 1899, and which continued to be so owned up to the date of such nationalization, and for the admission of the Peninsula, when the cession transferred her allegiance to the United States, and she was a citizen of Porto Rico under the act. And there was nothing expressed in the act, nor reasonably to be implied therefrom, to indicate the intention of Congress that citizens of Porto Rico should be considered as aliens, and the right of free access denied to them.

Counsel for the government contends that the test of Gonzales' rights was citizenship of the United States, and not alienage. We do not think so, and, on the contrary, are of opinion that, if Gonzales were not an alien within the act of 1891, the order below was erroneous.

Conceding to counsel that the general terms "alien," "citizen," "subject," are not absolutely inclusive, or completely comprehensive, and that, therefore, neither of the numerous definitions of the term "alien" is necessarily controlling, we, nevertheless, cannot concede, in view of the language of the treaty and of the act of April 12, 1900, that the word "alien," as used in the act of 1891, embraces the citizens of Porto Rico.

We are not required to discuss the power of Congress in the premises; or the contention of Gonzales' counsel that the cession of Porto Rico accomplished the naturalization of its people; or that of Commissioner Degetau, in his excellent argument as amicus curiæ, that a citizen of Porto Rico, under the act of 1900, is necessarily a citizen of the United States. The question is the narrow one whether Gonzales was an alien within the meaning of that term as used in the act of 1891.

[13] *The act excludes from admission into the United States, "in accordance with the existing acts regulating immigration other than those concerning Chinese laborers," certain classes of "aliens" or "alien immigrants" arriving at any place within the United States, in respect of all of whom it is required that the commanding officer and agents of the vessel by which they come shall report the name, nationality, last residence and destination before any are landed.

The decisions of the inspection officers adverse to the right to land are made final unless an appeal is taken to the Superintendent of Immigration, whose action is subject to review by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all aliens who unlawfully come into the United States in violation of law shall be immediately, if practicable, sent back, or may be returned as by law provided.

We think it clear that the act relates to foreigners as respects this country, to persons owing allegiance to a foreign government, and citizens or subjects thereof; and that citizens of Porto Rico, whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States; who live in the peace of the dominion of the United States; the organic law of whose domicil was enacted by the United States, and is enforced through officials sworn to support the Constitution of the United States,— are not "aliens," and upon their arrival by water at the ports of our mainland are not "alien immigrants," within the intent and meaning of the act of 1891.

Indeed, instead of the immigration laws operating externally and adversely to the citizens of Porto Rico, they were themselves put in force and effect there by § 14 of the act of April 12, 1900, as the Secretary of the Treasury was advised by the acting Attorney General, July 15, 1902, in respect of the act "to Regulate Immigration," approved August 3, 1882 (22 Stat. at L. 214, chap. 376, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1288); 24 Ops. Atty. Gen. 86. The act provided for the collection of "a duty of 50 cents for each and every passenger, not a citizen of the United States, who shall come by steam or sail vessel from a foreign port to any port within the United States. . . ."[14]

The money thus collected shall be paid into the United States Treasury, and shall constitute a fund to be called the immigrant fund, and shall be used, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to defray the expense of regulating immigration under this act. . . ."

By § 2 inspection was provided for, "and if, on such examination, there shall be found among such passengers any convict, lunatic, idiot, or any person unable to take care of himself or herself without becoming a public charge, they shall report the same in of the same to all the benefits of the coasting trade of the United States; and the coasting trade between Porto Rico and the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts of the United States."

"Sec. 14. That the statutory laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, except as hereinbefore or hereinafter otherwise provided, shall have the same force and effect in Porto Rico as in the United States, except the internal revenue laws, which, in view of the provisions of § 3, shall not have force and effect in Porto Rico."

"Sec. 16. That all judicial process shall run in the name of 'United States of America, ss.: The President of the United States,' and all criminal or penal prosecutions in the local courts shall be conducted in the name and by the authority of 'The People of Porto Rico;' and all officials authorized by this act shall before entering upon the duties of their respective offices take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Porto Rico."

writing to the collector of such port, and such persons shall not be permitted to land."

The department held that the duty collected in Porto Rican ports should be accounted for and credited to the "immigrant fund," as is done with collections upon alien passengers arriving at ports in the United States.

In Huus v. New York & P. R. S. S. Co. 182 U. S. 392, 396, 45 L. ed. 1146, 1151, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 827, 829, we held that, by § 9 of the act of April 12, 1900, "it was evidently intended, not only to nationalize all Porto Rican vessels as vessels of the United States, and to admit them to the benefits of their coasting trade, but to place Porto Rico substantially upon the coast of the United States, and vessels engaged in trade between that island and the continent, as engaged in the coasting trade."

Again, in respect of § 703 of the tariff act of July 24, 1897 (30 Stat. at L. 203, chap. 11), exempting "works of art, the production of American artists residing temporarily abroad," the Department of Justice held that Mr. Molinas, a native of Porto Rico, and an artist, temporarily living in Biarritz, France, and there on April 11, 1899, became, under § 7 of the act of April 12, 1900, a citizen of Porto Rico, and as such an American artist entitled to the privileges of that paragraph. 24 Ops. Atty. Gen. 40.

The Attorney General, in his communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, among other things, said: "It will be observed that § 703, above quoted, does not mention citizenship, but uses the phrase 'American artists.' It is clearly not incon-[15]ceivable *for a man to be an American artist within the meaning of such a statute and yet not a citizen of the United States." And after commenting on the effect of the temporary absence of Mr. Molinas at the time the treaty was proclaimed, the Attorney General concluded his opinion thus: "But even in supposing that a native Porto Rican like Mr. Molinas, temporarily absent at the date of the treaty, has been unintentionally omitted from § 7, he is undoubtedly one of those turned over to the United States by article 9 of the treaty to belong to our nationality. He is also clearly a Porto Rican; that is to say, a permanent inhabitant of that island, which was also turned over by Spain to the United States. As his country became a domestic country, and ceased to be a foreign country within the meaning of the tariff act above referred to, and has now been fully organized as a country of the United States by the Foraker act, it seems to me that he has become an American, notwithstanding such supposed omission."

The Attorney General applied the ruling in De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U. S. 1, 45 L. ed. 1041, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 743, that "with the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, April 11, 1899, the island of Porto Rico ceased to be a 'foreign country' within the meaning of the tariff laws."

In that case we were all of opinion that the action was properly brought, because, as the question was whether the goods were imported at all, the case did not fall within the customs administrative act. Re Fassel, 142 U. S. 479, 35 L. ed. 1087, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295.

And in the present case, as Gonzales did not come within the act of 1891, the commissioner had no jurisdiction to detain and deport her by deciding the mere question of law to the contrary; and she was not obliged to resort to the Superintendent or the Secretary.

Our conclusion is not affected by the provision in the sundry civil act of August 18, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 372, 390, chap. 301, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1363), in relation to the finality of the decisions of the appropriate immigration or custom officers, or the similar provision in the act "to Regulate the Immigration of Aliens into the United States," *approved March 3, 1903[16] (32 Stat. at L. 1213, chap. 1012, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1903, p. 170). The latter act was approved after the Gonzales litigation was moved, but it is worthy of notice that the words "United States" as used in the title and throughout the act were required to be construed to mean "the United States and any waters, territory, or other place now subject to the jurisdiction thereof." § 33. The definition indicates the view of Congress on the general subject.

Gonzales was not a passenger from a foreign port, and was a passenger "from territory or other place" subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

In order to dispose of the case in hand, we do not find it necessary to review the Chinese exclusion acts and the decisions of this court thereunder.

Final order reversed, and cause remanded with a direction to discharge Gonzales.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Police Court of that District, imposing a fine as a punishment for the violation of an act of Congress to prevent smoke in the District. Dismissed.

See same case below, 20 App. D. C. 336.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. C. Cole and J. J. Darlington argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

This court has determined that it has jurisdiction in all cases where the validity of Federal statutes or authority is drawn in question.

Messrs. Andrew B. Duvall and E. H. Thomas submitted the cause for defendant in error:

The fine is a punishment for the offense committed, and is not a matter in dispute; and, in cases such as this, criminal in character, the question is the guilt or innocence of the accused.

United States v. More, 3 Cranch, 159, 2 L. ed. 397.

Section 8 of the act of February 9, 1893, and § 233 of the Code of the District of Columbia, are substantially alike.

The former act referred to cases only where there was a pecuniary matter in dispute, measureable by some sum or value, and referred neither to criminal cases nor to cases where the question was of the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 82, 36 L. ed. 896, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22; Chapman v. United States, 164 U. S. 436, 41 L. ed. 504, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76.

Plaintiff in error was prosecuted by information in the police court of the District of 192 U. S.

Columbia for a violation of an act of Congress, approved February 2, 1899, entitled "An Act for the Prevention of Smoke in the District of Columbia, and for Other Purposes" (30 Stat. at L. 812, chap. 79), and was found and adjudged guilty, and sentenced "to pay a fine of $50 and in default to be committed to the workhouse for the term of ninety days." The judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, 20 App. D. C. 336, brought here on error, and argued on the merits and on motion to dismiss.

The court of appeals of the District of Columbia was established by an act of Congress, approved February 9, 1893 (27 Stat. at L. 434, chap. 74, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 573), § 8 of which was as follows:

"That any final judgment or decree of the said court of appeals may be re-examined and affirmed, reversed, or modified by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error or appeal, in all causes in which the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of five thousand dollars, in the same manner and under the same regulations as heretofore provided for in cases of writs of error on judgment or appeals from decrees rendered in the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and also in cases, without regard to the sum or value of the matter in dispute, wherein is involved the validity of any patent or copyright, or in which is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States."

On March 3, 1901, an act "To Establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia" (31 Stat. at L. 1189, chap. 854), was approved (and subsequently amended by acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902 [32 Stat. at L. 2, chap. 5; 32 Stat. at L. 520, chap. 1329]), § 233 of which provides that—

"Any final judgment or decree of the court of appeals may be re-examined and affirmed, [18] reversed, or modified by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error or appeal, in all cases in which the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of five thousand dollars, in the same manner and under the same regulations as existed in cases of writs of error on judgments or appeals from decrees rendered in the supreme court of the District of Columbia on February ninth, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, and also in cases, without regard to the sum or value of the matter in dispute, wherein is involved the validity of any patent or copyright, or in which is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States."

It will be perceived that § 8 of the one act and § 233 of the other are in substance the same, and they must bear the same construction. And the ruling in Chapman v. United States, 164 U. S. 436, 41 L. ed. 504, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76, in respect of § 8, is decisive to the point that this writ of error cannot be maintained.

That case, as stated by the court, was this:

"Chapman was indicted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia for an alleged violation of § 102 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 55) in refusing to answer certain questions propounded to him by a special committee of the Senate of the United States, appointed to investigate charges in connection with proposed legislation then pending in the Senate. To this indictment the defendant demurred on the ground, among others, that § 102 of the Revised Statutes was unconstitutional, and that, therefore, the court was without jurisdiction in the premises. This demurrer was overruled by the trial court, and its judgment thereon affirmed by the court of appeals of the District. 5 App. D. C. 122. Defendant was thereupon tried and convicted, and motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment having been made and overruled (the question of the constitutionality of § 102 being raised throughout the proceedings), was sentenced to be imprisoned for one month in jail, and [19] to pay a fine of $100 *which judgment was affirmed on appeal. 8 App. D. C. 302, 24 Wash. L. Rep. 251. A writ of error from this court was then allowed, 8 App. D. C. 320, 24 Wash. L. Rep. 297, which the United States moved to dismiss."

It was held that this court had no jurisdiction to review on writ of error a judgment of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia in a criminal case under § 8 of the act of February 9, 1893; and the writ of error was accordingly dismissed. Attention was called to the fact that it had been previously decided that the court had no jurisdiction to grant a writ of error to review the judgments of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in criminal cases, either under the judiciary act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517, 26 Stat. at L. 826 (Re Heath, 144 U. S. 92, 36 L. ed. 358, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 615); or under the act of Feb. 6, 1889, chap. 113, 25 Stat. at L. 655 (Cross v. United States, 145 U. S. 571, 36 L. ed. 821, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 842), or on habeas corpus (Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 82, 36 L. ed. 896, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22). And although the validity of any patent or copyright, or of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, was not drawn in question in those cases, it was distinctly ruled in reaching the conclusions announced that neither of the sections of the act of March 3, 1885 [23 Stat. at L. 443, chap. 355, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 572] applied to any criminal case; and Farnsworth v. Montana, 129 U. S. 104, 32 L. ed. 616, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253; United States v. Sanges, 144 U. S. 310, 36 L. ed. 445, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, and United States v. More, 3 Cranch, 159, 2 L. ed. 397, were cited with approval.

We were of opinion that § 8 of the act establishing the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and the act of March 3, 1885 (chap. 355, 23 Stat. at L. 443, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 572), were the same in their meaning and legal effect. The 1st section of the act of 1885 prohibited appeals or writs of error unless the matter in dispute exceeded the sum of $5,000, but the 2d section provided that the restriction should not apply to cases wherein the validity of any patent or copyright was involved, or where the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, was drawn in question, and that in all such cases an appeal or writ of error might be brought without regard to the sum or value in dispute. And it was *ruled that [20] the last clause of § 8 of the act of 1893 must receive the same construction as had been given to the 2d section of the act of 1885. We said: "The meaning of both statutes is that, in the cases enumerated, the limitation on the amount is removed, but both alike refer to cases where there is pecuniary matter in dispute, measurable by some sum or value, and they alike have no application to criminal cases."

United States v. More, 3 Cranch, 159, 2 L. ed. 397, was cited to the main proposition, and was quoted from in respect of the suggestion that because the punishment on conviction by the statute under which plaintiff in error was indicted, tried, and convicted embraced a fine, there was, therefore, a sum of money in dispute. The case involved § 8 of the act of February 27, 1801, chap. 15, entitled "An Act Concerning the District of Columbia" (2 Stat. at L. 103, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 573), and creating a circuit court for the District of Columbia, which provided "that any final judgment, order, or decree in said circuit court, wherein the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the value of one hundred dollars, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, by writ of error or appeal. . . ." It was held that this court had no jurisdiction under that section over the judgments of the circuit court of the District of Columbia in criminal cases, and Chief Justice Marshall said: "On examining the act 'Concerning the District of Columbia,' the court is of opinion that the appellate jurisdiction granted by that act is confined to civil cases. The words, 'matter in dispute,' seem appropriated to civil cases, where the subject in contest has a value beyond the sum mentioned in the act. But, in criminal cases, the question is the guilt or innocence of the accused. And although he may be fined upwards of $100, yet that is, in the eye of the law, a punishment for the offense committed, and not the particular object of the suit."

And the previous ruling that § 5 of the judiciary act of 1891 had no application was repeated.

[21] Chapman's Case* was decided November 30, 1896, and on the 3d of March, 1897, an act was approved which authorized this court to issue writs of certiorari in cases made final in that court, to bring them up for review and determination. 29 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 390, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 574. This was carried forward into § 234 of the District Code, and in the meantime we had reviewed the judgment of the court of appeals in certain criminal cases on certiorari granted under the act. Winston v. United States, 172 U. S. 303, 43 L. ed. 456, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 212, 171 U. S. 690, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 887.

The rule that applies to capital cases and infamous crimes applies to the criminal offenses over which the police court of the District of Columbia exercises jurisdiction, and under that rule this writ of error must be dismissed.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 21-28.)

Commerce—state tax on cab service furnished by railroad company.

A franchise tax imposed under appropriate statutes of the state of New York upon the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for carrying on a cab service wholly within the state, for the purpose of conveying its passengers to and from its ferry landing in New York city, the charges for which are entirely separate from those for other transportation, is not an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce, but is a tax upon an independent local service, preliminary or subsequent to any interstate transportation.

Argued December 11, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York to review a judgment sustaining an assessment by the state comptroller of a franchise tax on a cab service furnished by a railroad company, entered in pursuance of an affirmance by the New York Court of Appeals of an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of that State, confirming, on a writ of certiorari, the determination of the comptroller. Affirmed.

See same case below in Appellate Division of Supreme Court, 67 App. Div. 398, 73 N. Y. Supp. 790, and in Court of Appeals, 171 N. Y. 354, 64 N. E. 152.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

This is a writ of error to the supreme court of the state of New York to review a judgment of that court affirming the *as-[22] assessment by the comptroller of the state of New York of a certain tax against the relator, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the tax, which is a franchise tax imposed under appropriate statutes of New York upon the company for carrying on the business of running cabs and carriages for hire between points entirely within the state of New York, is invalid under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, article I., § 8, subdivision 3.

The facts are undisputed. In 1897 the company established a cab stand on its own premises at the Twenty-third street ferry in the city of New York, and has since maintained a service of cabs and coaches under special licenses from the city of New York, whereby they can stand on those premises only. The sole business done by those cabs and coaches is to bring the company's passengers to and from the Twenty-third street ferry. The charges for this service are separate from those of the company for further transportation, and no part of its receipts from the cab service is received as compensation for any service outside the state of New York. As a separate business, this cab service has not been profitable to the company, but has been operated at a loss. The validity of this tax was sustained both by the supreme court and the court of appeals of New York.

67 App. Div. 398, 73 N. Y. Supp. 790, 171 N. Y. 354, 64 N. E. 152.

Mr. Henry Galbraith Ward argued the cause, and, with Mr. A. Leo Everett and Messrs. Robinson, Biddle, & Ward, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The taxes in question are laid upon the privilege of doing business.

People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720.

The taxes cannot, therefore, be justified as if they were taxes upon property, or taxes upon a franchise regarded as part of the corporation's property, as in the following cases:

Adopting the careful and exhaustive classification given in the case last cited, this case is in the category of those in which the tax has been held to be upon the privilege of engaging in commerce.

Kentucky*, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851.

In the operation of its cab service the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is wholly engaged in interstate commerce.

Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999; Foster v. Davenport, 22 How. 244, 16 L. ed. 248; Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. ed. 1088, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 664; Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. 336, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229; Kelley v. Rhoads, 188 U. S. 1, 47 L. ed. 359, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 259.

These decisions show that the court does not employ any arbitrary tests or distinctions which may be good for one case but not for another, but investigates each one upon its facts; and, if the transportation is interstate commerce in point of fact, though no contract is made for through transportation, it will be protected from state interference.

We see the same regard for the substance, rather than form, of the transaction in—

Cutting v. Florida R. & Nav. Co. 46 Fed. 641, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 665; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Armstrong (Tex. Civ. App.) 43 S. W. 614; State v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 44 S. W. 542.

Mr. John Cunneen argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

The cab service maintained in the city of New York by the plaintiff in error is not interstate commerce, and the tax imposed upon it is valid.

Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; Diamond Match Co. v. Ontonagon, 188 U. S. 82, 47 L. ed. 394, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention of the company is that this cab service is merely an extension, and therefore a part of, its interstate transportation; that it is not carrying on a cab business generally in the city of New York, but is merely furnishing the service to those who seek to take over its lines some interstate transportation, thus commencing the transportation from their houses instead of from the ferry landing, or like service to those who have already received such interstate transportation, thus completing the transportation to their places of destination; that the character of the business remains unchanged, although individuals may avail themselves of this service who do not intend or have not received any interstate transportation, for they who thus use the service do so wrongfully and against the wish of the company. In other words, the company, to promote its general business, seeks only to complete the continuous transportation of interstate passengers to or from their residences or hotels in New York city instead of commencing and ending such transportation at the ferry landing at Twenty-third street; the character of the service depends not on the action of the passenger, but on the purpose of the company in providing it, and the omission to include the charge for the cab service in the charges for other transportation arises from the practical difficulty of making such inclusion, and does not alter the fact that such cab service is a part of the interstate transportation.

[26] *To hold the even balance between the nation and the states in the exercise of their respective powers and rights, always difficult, is becoming more so through the growing complexity of social life and business conditions. Into many relations and transactions there enter elements of a national as well as those of a state character, and to determine in a given case which elements dominate, and assign the relation or transaction to the control of the nation or of the state, is often most perplexing. And this case fully illustrates the perplexities.

It is true that a passenger over the Pennsylvania Railroad to the city of New York does not, in one sense, fully complete his journey when he reaches the ferry landing on the New York side, but only when he is delivered at his temporary or permanent stopping place in the city. Looking at it from this standpoint, the company's cab service is simply one element in a continuous interstate transportation, and as such would be excluded from state, and be subject to national, control. The state may not tax for the privilege of doing an interstate commerce business. Atlantic & P. Tel. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. 95, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817. On the other hand, the cab service is exclusively rendered within the limits of the city. It is contracted and paid for independently of any contract or payment for strictly interstate transportation. The party receiving it owes no legal duty of crossing the state line.

Undoubtedly, a single act of carriage or transportation wholly within a state may be part of a continuous interstate carriage or transportation. Goods shipped from Albany to Philadelphia may be carried by the New York Central Railroad only within the limits of New York, and yet that service is in interstate carriage. By reason thereof the nation regulates that carriage, including the part performed by the New York company. But it does not follow therefrom that the New York company is wholly relieved from state regulation and state taxation, for a part of its work is carriage and transportation begun and ended within the state. So the Pennsylvania company, which is engaged largely in interstate *transportation, is amenable[27] to state regulation and state taxation as to any of its service which is wholly performed within the state, and not as a part of interstate transportation. Wherever a separation in fact exists between transportation service wholly within the state and that between the states, a like separation may be recognized between the control of the state and that of the nation. Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214; Pullman Co. v. Adams, 189 U. S. 420, 47 L. ed. 877, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494.

As we have seen, the cab service is rendered wholly within the state, and has no contractual or necessary relation to interstate transportation. It is either preliminary or subsequent thereto. It is independently contracted for, and not necessarily connected therewith. But when service is wholly within a state, it is presumably subject to state control. The burden is on him who asserts that, though actually within, it is legally outside, the state; and unless the interstate character is established, locality determines the question of jurisdiction. Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, though not in all respects similar, is very closely in point. In that case spruce logs had been drawn down from Wentworth's Location in New Hampshire, and placed in Clear Stream, also in New Hampshire, to be from thence floated down the Androscoggin river to the state of Maine, there to be manufactured and sold. After they had thus been drawn down and placed in Clear Stream, a tax was imposed upon them by the state of New Hampshire. The validity of that tax was challenged on the ground that the logs were in process of transportation from Wentworth's Location in New Hampshire to the state of Maine. It was sustained by the supreme court of New Hampshire, and also by this court. In the course of the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley are these pertinent observations (p. 528, L. ed. p. 719, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 479):

"It is true, it was said in the case of The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 565, 19 L. ed. 999, 1002: 'Whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one state to another, commerce in that commodity between the states has commenced.' But this movement does not begin until the [28]articles have been *shipped or started for transportation from the one state to the other. The carrying of them in carts or other vehicles, or even floating them, to the depot where the journey is to commence, is no part of that journey. That is all preliminary work, performed for the purpose of putting the property in a state of preparation and readiness for transportation. Until actually launched on its way to another state, or committed to a common carrier for transportation to such state, its destination is not fixed and certain. It may be sold or otherwise disposed of within the state, and never put in course of transportation out of the state. Carrying it from the farm, or the forest, to the depot, is only an interior movement of the property, entirely within the state, for the purpose, it is true, but only for the purpose, of putting it into a course of exportation; it is no part of the exportation itself. Until shipped or started on its final journey out of the state its exportation is a matter altogether in fieri, and not at all a fixed and certain thing."

Diamond Match Co. v. Ontonagon, 188 U. S. 82, 47 L. ed. 394, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266; Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 21 C. C. A. 103, 43 U. S. App. 308, 74 Fed. 803, 167 U. S. 633, 42 L. ed. 306, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 986.

As shown in the opinion from which we have just quoted, many things have more or less close relation to interstate commerce which are not properly to be regarded as a part of it. If the cab which carries the passengers from the hotel to the ferry landing is engaged in interstate transportation, why is not the porter who carries the traveler's trunk from his room to the carriage also so engaged? If the cab service is interstate transportation, are the drivers of the cabs and the dealers who supply hay and grain for the horses also engaged in interstate commerce? And where will the limit be placed?

We are of opinion that the cab service is an independent local service, preliminary or subsequent to any interstate transportation, and therefore the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of New York was correct, and it is affirmed.

Error to state court—Federal question.

1. A Federal question is raised too late to confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of the United States to review a judgment of a state court when asserted for the first time in the petition for the allowance of a writ of error from the former court.
2. A writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court to a state court will be dismissed where the Federal question relied upon to confer such jurisdiction manifestly lacks all color of merit.

IN ERROR to the St. Louis Court of Appeals of the State of Missouri to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis, denying the relief sought by the plaintiff against the enforcement of certain judgments. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

See same case below (Mo. App.) 75 S. W. 691.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

The action wherein was entered the judgment which is sought to be reviewed by this writ of error was begun on December 20, 1900, by the filing in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis of a petition on behalf of the Wabash Railroad Company, the plaintiff in error in this court. The defendants named in the petition were Alexander Flannigan and Virgil Rule, the present defendants in error. The cause of action was ultimately embodied in a third amended petition, filed, by leave of court, on April 15, 1901. From a recital made in the opinion of the St. Louis court of appeals the following summary of the allegations of that pleading is made:

After asserting its existence as a consolidated corporation from a named date, plaintiff alleged that it was indebted, on June 10, 1891, to one Tourville, for wages, in the sum of $81.98; that an action to recover such indebtedness was instituted by Tourville in a court of the state of Missouri on the date named, and that a judgment was rendered

NOTE.—On writs of error from United States Supreme Court to state courts—see notes to Hamblin v. Western Land Co. 37 L. ed. U. S. 267; Kipley v. Illinois, 42 L. ed. U. S. 998; and Re Buchanan, 39 L. ed. U. S. 884

[30] in favor of *Tourville, which had been finally affirmed by this court; that in April, 1895, the defendant Flannigan recovered judgment against Tourville and the railroad company in a court of the state of Illinois, the railroad company being made garnishee in the action on account of the original indebtedness of $81.98 to Tourville, above mentioned; that Tourville had assigned the judgment obtained by him in the Missouri court to the defendant Virgil Rule, and that both the defendants Flannigan and Rule were undertaking to collect their respective judgments from the railroad company. The court was asked to permit a deposit in court of the sum of $81.98 and interest, and to require the defendants to interplead and to have determined their rights in respect to such deposited sum. The defendant Rule was served with summons, and a written appearance was filed on behalf of Flannigan, who was a nonresident.

In stating the subsequent steps in the litigation we shall omit reference to the facts which clearly have no relevancy to the alleged Federal questions.

Following the filing of the third amended petition an application was made for the allowance of a temporary injunction against the defendants, prohibiting them from attempting to enforce their respective judgments pending the determination of the action. An order was thereupon made, temporarily restraining the defendants, and requiring them "to show cause, if any they have, why a temporary injunction should not be issued herein, and the relief prayed for in said third amended petition should not be granted." A "return" to this order to show cause was filed on behalf of the defendant Rule, and therein was set forth numerous reasons why a temporary injunction should not issue and the relief prayed in the third amended petition should not be granted. Flannigan answered, admitting each and every allegation therein, and claiming priority of lien and right of payment out of the so-called fund of $81.98. Thereafter, on April 22, 1901, the plaintiff filed a motion for the relief prayed for, not-

[31] withstanding *the aforesaid return of Virgil Rule, and numerous reasons were stated in support of the motion. On April 29, 1901, the court entered the following order:

"Now at this day come the parties herein by their respective attorneys, and the order issued herein on April 15, 1901, commanding the defendants to show cause why a temporary injunction should not be granted against them, coming on for hearing upon the pleadings, affidavits, and proofs adduced, and the court having duly considered the same, and being sufficiently advised of and concerning the premises, doth order that the prayer of plaintiff's bill be and is denied. It is further ordered by the court that the restraining order granted against defendants on April 15, 1901, be and is hereby dissolved."

A motion for rehearing was filed and overruled. The motion was based upon the assumption that the order in question operated as a judgment dismissing the petition. The fifteenth and last ground of the motion and the first and only specific reference made to the Constitution of the United States in the proceedings up to that time was as follows:

"Fifteenth. Because the court erred in refusing to give full faith and credit to the judgment of a sister state, as required by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

On appeal the St. Louis court of appeals entered a judgment affirming in all things the "judgment" of the trial court. 75 S. W. 691. No allusion was made in the opinion to any constitutional question. Application was then made to transfer the cause to the supreme court of Missouri, upon the claim that it involved "a construction of § 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States." The application was denied. A petition was next presented to the presiding judge of the St. Louis court of appeals, praying the allowance of a writ of error from this court. The petition was overruled, for the following stated reasons:

"In Wabash R. Co. v. Tourville, 179 U. S. 322, 45 L. ed. 210, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 113, the judgment herein involved came under review. The validity of the Tourville judgment, as we understand the opinion, *was [32] sustained, and its priority over that of Flannigan was adjudged. In the face of this decision we deny the writ."

A writ of error was afterwards allowed by a justice of this court. The error assigned embraced the following alleged Federal questions:

"19. Your petitioner charges and avers that in said suit, while the same was pending in said circuit court and in said court of appeals, the construction of the following clauses of the Constitution of the United States was drawn in question, viz.:

"The following clause of § 1, article IV.: 'Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state.'

"Section 11, article IV.: 'The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.'

"The following clause of § 1, article XIV., of amendments to the Constitution: 'No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law."

"Your petitioner says that the decisions of courts on said clauses of the Constitution in said cause were against the rights, title, privilege, and exemption specially set up and claimed under said clauses of said Constitution by your petitioner."

Mr. Wells H. Blodgett submitted the cause for plaintiff in error. Mr. George S. Grover was with him on the brief:

This court has ample jurisdiction to hear and determine this controversy by reason of the constitutional question apparent upon the face of the record.

When a suit in a state court involves in any manner a judgment of a sister state, and one of the parties to the suit sets up or claims that such judgment, under the law and usage of the state where rendered, gives him certain rights, or entitles him to certain remedies, and the state court denies such claim, a Federal question is presented of which this court will take jurisdiction by writ of error.

Mr. John D. Johnson submitted the cause for defendants in error. Mr. Virgil Rule was with him on the brief:

The decision of the St. Louis court of appeals was upon the ground that all the parties to the bill of interpleader had had their day in court, and that the questions raised were res judicata. This is not a Federal question, and this court is, therefore, without jurisdiction.

In order to give this court power to revise the judgment of a state court, it must appear upon the transcript that the constitutional question was raised by the pleadings, and decided against plaintiff in error.

Mr. Justice White, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of this court, upholding the correctness of the judgment entered by the circuit court of Missouri in favor of Tourville, referred to in the preceding statement, was announced on December 3, 1900. Wabash R. Co. v. Tourville, 179 U. S. 322, 45 L. ed. 210, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 113. The action now under review was begun seventeen days later. In the action which was under review in 179 U. S. the contention on behalf of the railroad company was that, despite the fact that on March 26, 1895, the supreme court of Missouri, on appeal by Tourville, had entered a judgment directing the St. Louis court of appeals to render judgment in favor of Tourville for the full amount of wages earned by him, the railroad company was yet entitled, after the filing in the St. Louis court of appeals of the mandate of the higher court, to offset against the amount of the judgment directed to be entered in favor of Tourville, the sum of the judgment recovered by Flannigan in the attachment suit which had been instituted in Illinois subsequently to the decision of the supreme court of Missouri in Tourville's action. The claim of jurisdiction in this court to review the judgment of the supreme court of Missouri, just referred to, was based upon the contention that the refusal of the Missouri courts to give to the Illinois judgment in favor of Flannigan the effect claimed for it by the railroad company was a denial of the full faith and credit to which that judgment was entitled by virtue of § 1 of article IV. of the Constitution of the [37] United States. *As already stated, the present action was begun after the opinion reported in 179 U. S. 322, 45 L. ed. 210, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 113, affirming the judgment of the supreme court of Missouri, was delivered.

The controversy in the present action relates to the same judgments which were under consideration in this court in the prior action, and the purpose of the railroad company in this, as in the previous case, was to limit the amount which might be collected by the holders of the respective judgments against it to a sum which in the aggregate would not be in excess of the indebtedness to Tourville upon his original claim. In substance, therefore, the present action is but an attempt by indirection to do that which the supreme court of Missouri and this court has held in the prior action could not be done.

The constitutional questions now urged on behalf of plaintiff in error are that the dismissal of its petition for interpleader was a denial of full faith and credit to the garnishment judgment rendered by the Illinois court, and that the denial of the relief prayed for also violated the due process clause of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The objection, last stated, need not be further noticed, as it was asserted for the first time in the petition for the allowance of a writ of error from this court. We think it unavoidably results also that the claim of the protection of the due faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States here relied on is without merit. Nowhere in its petition for interpleader or in the proceedings had thereunder in the Missouri courts did the railroad company set up rights specifically based upon the Illinois judgment, claim for that judgment an effect which, if denied to it, would have impaired its force and effect, nor did the railroad company predicate any right to the relief demanded upon the effect due to the Illinois judgment. The relief asked by the railroad company in substance tended, on the contrary, to lessen the force and effect both of the Missouri and Illinois judgments. It was sought to change the status of the company from that of a general debtor for [38] the amount due upon each judgment, and to engraft upon the judgments a limitation to a single satisfaction out of a specific fund. In its petition the railroad company expressly alleged its inability to determine whether the Illinois or the Missouri judgment possessed a priority of right to payment out of the so-called fund. Clearly, also, even the owner and holder of the Illinois judgment could not, in reason, contend that the judgment of the Missouri court complained of had the effect of denying full faith and credit to the judgment of a sister state. As the settled rule in this court is that where the Federal question asserted to be contained in a record is manifestly lacking all color of merit, the writ of error must be dismissed (Swafford v. Templeton, 185 U. S. 487, 493, 46 L. ed. 1005, 1008, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 783, and cases cited), it results that the writ of error in this case must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Writ of error dismissed.

Tariff—casts of sculpture.

1. The omission from the tariff act of 1897, § 638 (30 Stat. at L. 200, chap. 11, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1686), of the provisions of prior tariff acts for the free entry of casts, was not intended to prevent the free entry of such casts as also come within the designation of "casts of sculpture" which, under § 649, are entitled to free entry where specially imported, in good faith, for the use and by the order of any society incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, scientific, educational, or literary purposes.
2. Plaster casts of clay models, though painted and gilded and produced in unlimited quantities, are "casts of sculpture" which, under the tariff act of 1897, § 649 (30 Stat. at L. 151, 201, chap. 11, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1626, 1687), are entitled to free entry where specially imported, in good faith, for the use and by the order of any society incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, scientific, educational, or literary purposes.

Argued December 10, 11, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, which in turn had affirmed the decision of a board of general appraisers and the collector of the port of New York, assessing duties on plaster casts. Reversed with directions to the Circuit Court to reverse the decision of the board of general appraisers and of the collector, and to direct the latter to admit the casts to free entry.

See same case below, 51 C. C. A. 587, 113 Fed. 1016.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

Certain figures representing various saints, and also two figures of adoring angels, as specified in the collector's letter to the board of general appraisers, were, in [39] March, 1899, specially *imported into the port of New York in good faith, for the use and by the order of societies incorporated or established solely for religious purposes. The importers claimed the figures were entitled to free entry under paragraph 649 of the tariff act of 1897. (30 Stat. at L. 151, 201, chap. 11, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1626, 1687.) The appraiser returned them as "church statues, composed of plaster of Paris, decorated," or as "articles and wares composed wholly or in chief value of earthy or mineral substances, not specially provided for," and the collector assessed upon them a duty of 45 and 35 per cent ad valorem under paragraphs 97 and 450 of the same act (pages 156, 193). If dutiable, no question is made as to the correctness of the decision of the collector in assessing the duties as he did. The contention is that these figures were "specially provided for" in this act under the paragraph above mentioned, 649.

The importers protested against the decision of the collector, and the case went to the board of general appraisers. Testimony was taken by the board and it found as a fact the manner in which the figures were made, which was as follows:

"The clay model of the subject, of desired size, is covered by a workman with a coating some two inches thick of plaster of Paris. When this coating has 'set' or hardened sufficiently, the clay figure inside is broken up and removed, and a plaster of Paris mould thereof thus obtained. Plaster is then carefully forced into this mould, and when dry is taken out in the form of the original clay figure. This plaster figure, after having been carefully gone over by an artist or skilled workman to cure any defects in the moulding, is in turn thoroughly covered with specially prepared plaster for the final mould. This is made in sections, which when dry are removed, and together form a perfect mould, and this composite mould becomes the manufacturer's substitute for the artist's clay or plaster cast model from which he (the manufacturer) produces his moulded statues in unlimited numbers. In the moulding process the several sections of the mould are in turn laid with the concave side upward, and have a lining of 'carton pierre,' *one-half inch or [40] more in thickness, carefully laid and pressed into them by the moulder's hands with the aid of suitable tools. The extended arms, fingers, and other slender parts are strengthened by pieces of iron wire laid in the 'carton pierre,' which is then lined either with heavy paper or coarse woven vegetable fiber cloth secured with glue. After the 'carton pierre' has dried sufficiently, the several sections of the mould are removed and their contents joined together around a framework of wood, and a figure is thus formed, the counterpart of the original model. The statue then goes to a skilled workman called a 'finisher,' who, with knife or other instrument removes any roughness resulting from the joining of the sections, cures any other defects in the moulding, and smooths it down generally. It is then passed to the painter and decorator, who completes it in the style desired. The statues in 'carton romain' and in 'stone composition' are made in the same manner, except that the latter are uniformly lined with coarse cloth. The stations of the cross in 'carton pierre' and in terra cotta are produced in substantially the same way (those in terra cotta, however, being kiln dried or baked after moulding), and are painted and decorated in quite the same manner as the statues, the foreground and other landscape or perspective effects being painted in suitable tints or hues."

The protest was overruled by the board, and a petition for a review was duly filed by the importers (petitioners) and the case heard in the circuit court, southern district of New York, and that court affirmed the decision of the board. 107 Fed. 257. An appeal was taken to the circuit court of appeals, where the decision of the circuit court was affirmed on the opinion of the court below. Upon petition of the importers a writ of certiorari was issued from this court, and the case brought here for review.

Mr. W. Wickham Smith argued the cause, and, with Mr. Charles Curie, filed a brief for petitioners.

Assistant Attorney General McReynolds argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent.

Contentions of counsel sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners claim that the figures in question here are entitled to free entry under the provision of paragraph 649 of the tariff act of 1897 (30 Stat. at L. 151, 201, chap. 11, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1626, 1687), as being "casts of sculpture, where specially imported, in good faith, for the use and by order of any society incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific, or literary purposes," etc. The board of appraisers thought that on July 24, 1897, the day of the passage of the tariff act, and for many years prior thereto, those figures belonged to a class which was known in commerce, in art, and to the classifying officers of customs of the United States as "statuary," and specifically as "church statuary." In the opinion of the board it was stated:

[43] "It is the practice of professional sculptors to have their original creations in clay reproduced in plaster of Paris for permanent use as models from which the objects are sculptured in marble, stone or other material. The sculptor invariably goes over his plaster cast with utmost care, not only repairing any defects in the moulding, but defining more accurately the hair, finger nails, folds of the drapery, and outline generally, and, above all, perfecting the facial and general expression. These plaster of Paris models are known in commerce and in art as 'casts of sculpture.' They represent the artist's right and title to his creation, and unlike the merchandise in question here, are not painted and decorated, nor dealt in as ordinary commercial articles. Casts in plaster of Paris are likewise produced from rare objects of sculpture, generally for use in museums or art institutions, but sometimes for reproduction by sculptors in marble, stone, etc., and are also called 'casts of sculpture,' but are in strict sense 'casts from sculpture,' being cast from plaster of Paris from sculptural objects, such, for example, as the high relief frieze of the Parthenon at Athens, the facade of the guild of the Butchers house at Hildesheim, the tomb of Englebert, and other works in the Metropolitan Museum of Art mentioned in the testimony of Messrs. Stoltzenberg and Trueg."*

The board was of opinion that these figures were what is known in commerce, in art, and in common speech as "statuary," and were not "specimens or casts of sculpture," and were therefore assessed, as stated.

If these figures were to be entered as statuary, they would come in free under paragraph 649 of the act of 1897, but for the limitation contained in paragraph 454, which limits the term "statuary," as used in the act, so as to "include only such statuary as is cut, carved, or otherwise wrought by hand from a solid block or mass of marble, stone, or alabaster or from metal, and as is the professional production of a statuary or sculptor only." The circuit court did not regard it necessary in the disposition of the case to determine whether these particular *figures would come in free[44] as casts of sculpture under paragraph 649, if imported in the crude state, but held that as the figures had been painted and gilded, they were not thereafter casts of sculpture within the meaning of the act.

Upon the argument of this case at bar frequent reference was made by counsel to the provisions in former tariff acts upon this subject, as bearing upon the proper construction of the one under consideration. For convenience these provisions are reproduced in the margin as they existed in the act of 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 178, 193, chap. 68, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1625); the Rev. Stat. (§ 2505, pp. 482, 487, 488, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1625); the act of 1883 (22 Stat. at L. 488, 514, 520, chap. 121); the act of 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 567, 608, 609, chap. 1244); the act of 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 509, 543, 544, chap. 349); and in the present act of 1897 (30 Stat. at L. 151, 201, chap. 11, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1626, 1687.)†

All philosophical apparatus, instruments, books, maps, and charts, statutes, statuary, busts, and casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, plaster of Paris; paintings and drawings, etchings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, regalia, gems, and all collections of antiquities: Provided, The same be specially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

1726. [45] *An examination of the provisions of the various statutes shows a somewhat uniform purpose on the part of Congress to provide free entry to casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris, and also statuary and specimens of sculpture, when specially imported, in good faith, for the societies enumerated in the acts. It is also seen that under the language used in these different paragraphs, which may be described as the "philosophical and scientific," [46] and the "regalia and gems" *paragraphs, some article might be admitted under either paragraph. There is no doubt that under the tariff acts prior to that of 1897, these figures could have been admitted free of duty, as "casts of plaster of Paris." Indeed, the Treasury Department had so decided in a case hereafter cited. Those words, "casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris," which appear in all the statutes cited prior to 1897, in the philosophical apparatus paragraphs, are left out in the *act of 1897, paragraph 638, and [47] it is therefore urged that the figures are not entitled to free entry, as they are not casts of sculpture, provided for in paragraph 649. The question is, therefore, whether the omission of those words in paragraph 638 prevents the free entry of these figures, or are they properly described as casts of sculpture, and therefore entitled to free entry under paragraph 649.

We do not attach any very great importance, as evidence of the intention of Congress, to the omission in the act of 1897 ty per centum ad valorem. But the term "statuary," as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only.

Paintings, in oil or water colors, and statuary, not otherwise provided for in this act, fifteen per centum ad valorem; but the term "statuary," as herein used, shall be understood to include only such statuary as is cut, carved, or otherwise wrought by hand from a solid block or mass of marble, stone, or alabaster, or from metal, and as is the professional production of a statuary or sculptor only.

(P. 608.) (Free list.) Par. 677. Philosophical and scientific apparatus, instruments, and preparations; statuary, casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris; paintings, drawings, and etchings, specially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society or institution incorporated or established for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific, or literary purposes, or for encouragement of the fine arts, and not intended for sale.

(P. 609.) (Free list.) Par. 692. Regalia and gems, statues, statuary, and specimens of sculpture, where specially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society incorporated or established solely for educational, philosophical, literary, or religious purposes.

Act of August 27, 1894. (28 Stat. at L. pp. 509, 543, 544, chap. 349.)

(P. 542.) (Free list.) Par. 575. Paintings, . . . and statuary, not otherwise provided for in this act, but the term "statuary" as herein used shall be understood to include only professional productions, whether round or in relief, in marble, stone, alabaster, wood, or metal, of a statuary or sculptor.

(P. 543.) (Free list.) Par. 585. Philosophical and scientific apparatus, . . . statuary, casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris, paintings, drawings, and etchings, specially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society or institution incorporated or established for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific, or literary purposes, or for encouragement of the fine arts, and not intended for sale.

(P. 544.) (Free list.) Par. 603. Regalia and gems, statues, statuary, and specimens or casts of sculpture, where especially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society incorporated or established solely for educational, philosophical, literary, or religious purposes.

Act of July 24, 1897 (the present act). (30 Stat. at L. pp. 151, 201, chap. 11, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1626, 1687.)

(P. 194.) Par. 454. Paintings, . . . and statuary, not especially provided for in this act, twenty per centum ad valorem; but the term "statuary" as used in this act shall be understood to include only such statuary as is cut, carved, or otherwise wrought by hand from a solid block or mass of marble, stone, or alabaster, or from metal, and as is the professional production of a statuary or sculptor only.

(P. 200.) (Free list.) Par. 638. Philosophical and scientific apparatus, utensils, instruments, and preparations, including bottles and boxes containing the same, specially imported, in good faith, for the use and by order of any society or institution incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific, or literary purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States, or any state or public library, and not for sale, subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

(P. 201.) (Free list.) Par. 649. Regalia and gems, statuary, and specimens or casts of sculpture, where specially imported, in good faith, for the use and by order of any society incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific, or literary purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, . . . and not for sale; above referred to. The language used in paragraph 649 is very broad, including all casts of sculpture, as well those heretofore mentioned in paragraphs in prior statutes similar to paragraph 638 as others. The omission in the latter paragraph was, therefore, immaterial if these figures are casts of sculpture. Although they might heretofore have come in under the designation of "casts of plaster of Paris" as contained in former paragraphs, we think they also might have come in under the designation "casts of sculpture" contained in the act of 1894 as well as in the act of 1897, and that it was not intended by Congress, in omitting the words in the latter act as to casts of plaster of Paris, in paragraph 638, to prevent their free entry under paragraph 649. The language in paragraph 638 was simply unnecessary in a case where the same articles were entitled to free entry under another paragraph.

In attempting to understand the true construction of the words used in the act of 1897 we are not very greatly aided by the opinions given by various artists called by the government and contained in this record, as to what was the proper designation of the figures. These opinions varied, although based upon conceded facts as to the manner and process by which the figures were produced. According to some of them there were but two kinds of "casts of sculpture;" one where professional sculptures have their own original creations of clay reproduced in plaster of Paris for permanent use as models, and from which objects are sculptured in marble, stone, or other material; and the other, where casts in plaster of Paris are *produced from rare objects of sculpture, generally for use in museums or art institutes. Some regarded the term "sculpture so wide that it was difficult to define definitely," although they thought that the figures in question were not casts of sculpture, while some regarded casts of sculpture "as such classes of plaster casts or clay or marble or bronze as are to stand singly and alone, and not be sold in endless numbers, and to be exhibited temporarily in some exhibition." We think the last definition is inaccurate and inadmissible. Under this view, whether a figure is a cast of sculpture or not, does not in the least depend upon how it is made. It is the use to which it is destined which is to determine what it is in fact. If there are to be a great many of them, to be "sold in endless numbers," they are not casts of sculpture, no matter how they are made, and if they are to "stand singly" and "be exhibited temporarily" then they are such casts. We are not satisfied as to the correctness or completeness of this definition. Whether in one case the cast is for the use of the sculptor only or in the other is destined to be reproduced indefinitely, we think is not material. They are made in the same manner, reproduced from clay, and the same means or process is taken or employed in obtaining the result. Whether the clay model is the work of the superior genius of a great sculptor or is the result of the efforts of one who could not be classed as a genius at all, they are both fashioned in the same way and the same process is followed with regard to both, and we do not think that in this statute there was any intention to confine the meaning to casts of those clay figures which were fashioned by the hand of genius, while excluding those of inferior artists or workmen. The witnesses are not, however, all of one mind, even upon the meaning of the term. Some thought that these were casts of sculpture in a certain sense as long as they remained simply plaster casts, but just as soon as additional touches were given to the casts, in the way of paint or ornamentation, the casts lost their original character as plaster casts and became statuary in wood or alabaster or bronze. *At any rate, it would cease to be an article of clay and would become a finished thing. Just as soon as a cast of sculpture was painted it would, in the opinion of some of the witnesses, cease to be a cast of sculpture. [49]

Some of the artists said that you might take a cast of old sculpture, such as the Venus de Milo, and different antiques, and reproduce them in plaster, and they would be casts of old sculpture. But whether the figures in question here were casts of sculpture, some of the witnesses were not sure.

One witness for the government gave as his opinion that the figures in question were casts or specimens because they are sculpture. As to whether they were cast or moulded, he replied that he could not state definitely, but presumably they were casts.

Another witness for the government was not willing to swear that the figures were not casts of sculpture, while still another said that in his judgment the figures in question were plaster casts in sculpture. He also thought that they might be termed casts of sculpture. Another witness for the government thought they might be called casts of bad sculpture, and that they were such articles as he had heard artists call casts of sculpture.

This brief review of some of the evidence shows the difference of opinion among the artists themselves as to what would come within their understanding of the definition of the term "casts of sculpture." The artists evidently had a contempt for the figures as specimens of art, and very probably that contempt was well founded; but, as we have said, the opinions really give no aid in considering whether the figures are or are not casts of sculpture. The description of the manner in which they are made, as set forth in the foregoing statement of facts, and also the evidence of the witnesses for the government, showing the unity of the method and process with that followed in the case of an admitted cast of sculpture, furnish us better means of determining the question in dispute than may be found in the opinions set forth in the record, and yet [50] some of *the witnesses do in fact, as we have seen, admit that the figures are casts of sculpture, bad though they may be.

The government also examined one or two witnesses who were agents or salesmen for manufacturers in this country of what they stated to be substantially the same class of figures as the ones under discussion, and in their catalogues describing the various articles for sale, figures such as these were generally designated as "statuary," and when taking orders for such goods they were called "statuary" or "composition statues."

One of the customs examiners also testified that for the last few years articles of the nature here in question had been returned on invoices to the collector as "church statuary composed of plaster, decorated, or pulverized cement and plaster." The witness used the expression "church statuary composed of" as having been given him by some superior officer, and it was accepted by him as such.

It will be observed that there is nothing in the tariff act which speaks of "church statuary" by name. We are not satisfied from this evidence that these figures are not casts of sculpture within the meaning of the statute, nor are we impressed with the statement of some of the witnesses that if, in what is termed their crude state, these figures might or would be described as casts of sculpture, they would cease to be such when painted or decorated. They are still, in substance, the same thing, whether painted or not. How does the mere gilding or painting alter their original character? Some little value has, perhaps, been added to them, but they yet remain what they were before the painting was done. Painting a marble statue does not alter its original substance, or give the subject a new definition or meaning. Some marble statues, the work of a great sculptor, have been slightly painted, under his own direction, for the purpose, as supposed, of imparting a more lifelike appearance to the statue, and of possibly thereby enhancing its value. But the statue remained a statue nevertheless.

It is so, as we think, in this case. The [51] painting or gilding *was done to render the figures more fit for the only purpose of their importation,—that is, for use in a religious society. And it was the object, as we believe, of the statute to admit such works free of duty.

In case No. 5,549, Synopsis of Decisions of the Treasury Department, 1883, p. 41, it was said that the case related to certain images made of earthen substances which, on importation, were subjected to duty at the rate of forty per centum ad valorem, but were claimed in the protest filed to be dutiable at the rate of ten per centum ad valorem, under the provisions for "statuary" contained in schedule M, Revised Statutes, p. 478, § 2504, under heading "Paintings and Statuary;" the word "statuary," being defined as limited "to include professional productions of a statuary, or of a sculptor only." It appeared on the trial that the images were made at Munich by persons who professed to have made a study of the art of sculpture for many years, and who acted under the general supervision of an acknowledged sculptor. Several copies were made from one model, and in ordering them the importer designated which he wanted by the number of the article in a catalogue, and the price of the images varied from five to a hundred dollars.

The circuit court for the southern district of New York held that the articles were entitled to admission as statuary under the provision above mentioned, and the Department acquiesced in the opinion of the court. In that case the Department was of opinion that the works were obviously made by skilful men, and might come in even under the limitation of the word "statuary" as defined in the act.

It cannot be and is not claimed that the figures in question here could come in under the term "statuary," as that term is defined in the statute of 1897, paragraph 454, which is much more narrow than that of the Revised Statutes. The case shows, however, the tendency of the Department to a liberal construction of the tariff act in this regard.

On December 22, 1885 (Synopsis of Decisions of the Treasury Department, 1885, p. 513, No. 7,274), the question was submitted *as to whether figures similar to those under [52] consideration were entitled to free admission under the act of 1883. The Department held that they could not be regarded as "statuary" because of the limitation of the meaning of the word "statuary," as used in that act (22 Stat. at. L. 513, chap. 121), which provided that the word "statuary" "should be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only," but that they might be admitted as casts of plaster of Paris under paragraph 759 of the free list. Paragraph 771 did not contain the words "casts of sculpture."

In Synopsis of Decisions, Treasury Department, July to December, 1891, vol. 2, p. 1164, there is contained a reply to the naval officer of New York relative to the proper classification of certain figures imported and claimed to be free of duty as statuary or as casts of plaster of Paris, imported for a church under paragraph 677, or as statues, statuary, or specimens of sculpture, under paragraph 692 of the tariff act of 1890. The Acting Secretary referred to the fact that the board of general appraisers had held that the restrictive definition in regard to "statuary" under paragraph 465 did not apply to such statuary as is specified in the free list. The language of that paragraph (465) the board held limited its definition of the term "statuary" to that paragraph alone. Continuing, the Secretary said:

"The Department believes that the crude or inartistic character of the figures under consideration cannot be urged as a reason for their exclusion from the benefits of free entry. It is fair to infer a liberal intention on the part of Congress from the fact of its inclusion of religious institutions among those to which the privilege of free entry is extended. Religious institutions are not schools of art, nor can congregations without adequate means always consult esthetic rules in regard to the equipment of their churches. It is the sentiment of pious associations which gives the figure its efficiency as an aid to religious worship, and the plaster cast may, in this way, be as servicable to the humble worshiper as the more costly work of genius."

- [53] *The subject was again before the Treasury Department on April 26, 1893. (Synopsis of Decisions, Treasury Department, 1893, p. 340.) As appears upon its face, the letter of the Secretary was in reply to a communication from the board of general appraisers, protesting against the free entry of articles of this nature under the act of 1890, because of the advantages thus given to the foreign dealer in these figures, some of whom had a store in Montreal, although the figures were manufactured in Munich, and the order was supplied from the Montreal store, and the board insisted that the figures were not entitled to such entry by the true construction of the statute. The Secretary, in reply, referred to what the board stated to have been the evident intention of Congress in the act that the "objects exempted from duty should be of such high order as to inspire admiration and devotional feeling," etc., and held that the views of the board might "apply to paragraphs 692 and 465, but not to paragraph 677, which provides (with the restriction enumerated in paragraph 465 and implied in paragraph 692) for the exemption from duty of all casts of plaster of Paris imported in good faith for the use of any society or institution incorporated or established for religious purposes."

It was further stated that "the Department cannot interpret the provisions of paragraph 677 as establishing in any respect the esthetic standard for such importations, and, without discussing the propriety of such standard, must administer the law according to its apparent intent." Also: "Under the last-named paragraph (677) it would appear that any plaster cast which should be regarded by a religious society as a desirable acquisition, and shall be classified by the collector as coming within the terms of that paragraph, may be imported free of all duty, without regard to its artistic character."

Looking at the various provisions in the tariff statutes, from and including 1861 to and including that of 1897, and taking into consideration the evidence in the record in this case, together with the action of the Treasury Department, as above referred to, the answer to the question of what is the *true meaning or construction of the words [54] "casts of sculpture," as used in the statute of 1897, is not perfectly clear. Some fair reason might, perhaps, be given for a construction which refuses free entry to these figures, but we think that the purpose of Congress was to permit their introduction free of duty as casts of sculpture, when specially imported, in good faith, for the use and by the order of any of the institutions named in the act. The paragraph in question (649) makes it necessary not only that the casts of sculpture should be specially imported, in good faith, for the use of a society, but it must be so imported by the order of such society. Here for the first time it is made necessary that the importation must have been by order of the society, which words are a still further limitation of the conditions upon the existence of which free entry is permitted.

It may well be that when the act of 1897 was drawn, its framers had in mind the objections above mentioned, made by the board of general appraisers, and therefore further limited the right of free entry to a special importation in good faith for the use and by order of the society, and to that extent protecting the interests of the "regular importers who sell from stock," while at the same time recognizing the policy of permitting a free entry to those societies who, in good faith, ordered the articles for their own special use.

We are of opinion that the evidence does not justify the assertion that the articles in question were simply known in a commercial sense as "statuary," or "church statuary." The fact that figures of this nature were designated as statuary in a catalogue of a manufacturer in this country does not clearly or conclusively establish such commercial designation. They were also designated composition statues by the salesman when taking orders for them. If the articles were also known as "casts of sculpture," and such language correctly described them, then they would come within the statute, although some manufacturers in this country should, for purposes of a short and easy description, describe them in the [55] catalogues as "statuary," *or "composition statues." It seems to us they answer the description of casts of sculpture, and are properly described as such in the act.

This provision of the statute should be liberally construed in favor of the importer, and if there were any fair doubt as to the true construction of the provision in question, the courts should resolve the doubt in his favor. American Net & Twine Co. v. Worthington, 141 U. S. 468, 35 L. ed. 821, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 55; United States v. Wigglesworth, 2 Story, 369, Fed. Cas. No. 16,690; Rice v. United States, 4 C. C. A. 104, 10 U. S. App. 670, 53 Fed. 910.

The judgments of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Second Circuit and of the Circuit Court in the Southern District of New York are reversed, with directions to the Circuit Court to reverse the decision of the board of general appraisers and of the collector, and to direct the collector to admit the figures to free entry.

So ordered.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

BOROUGH OF NEW HOPE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 55-64.)

Commerce—validity of state tax on telegraph poles and wires.

A judgment of a state court in an action to recover license fees on poles and wires of an interstate telegraph company, which awards to a municipality a considerably less sum than was due if the ordinance imposing such fees was valid, being for the same sum found to be due by the verdict of the jury to whom the question of the reasonableness of the ordinance had been submitted for the court's guidance, with directions to give a verdict for the full sum if they thought the ordinance was reasonable, otherwise to find for defendant,—will, on writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States, be held illegal and void because based upon an exercise of the police power which the court and jury by their action must be deemed to have determined to be unreasonable, and therefore invalid.

Argued December 11, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Superior Court of that State, which had affirmed a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Bucks County, awarding to a municipality, in an action to recover license fees on the poles and wires of an interstate telegraph company, a less sum than was due if the ordinance imposing such fees was valid. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 202 Pa. 532, 52 Atl. 127.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The borough of New Hope in January, 1899, commenced an action against the telegraph company, the plaintiff in error herein, to recover from it the sum of $552, with interest from the respective times in which portions of the amounts became due, the total charges being due from the defendant, as alleged, on account of a license fee taxed by the borough (by virtue of an ordinance to that effect) of $1 for each pole and of $2.50 for each mile of wire used in the borough by the company, the license to be applied for and the fee to be paid annually.

The company made what is termed in the record an affidavit of defense, which, among other things, averred that it was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York, and had accepted the act of Congress, approved July 24, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 221, chap. 230, relating to the construction of telegraph lines over any post road of the United States), and that its poles and wires through the borough of New Hope were employed and operated in the transmission of messages between the different states, and were therefore instruments of commerce; that the amount of the charges claimed to be due from the defendant under the ordinance was unreasonable, unjust, and excessive; that the fee was sought to be justified as a license merely, but that the amount thereof was wholly disproportionate to the usual, ordinary, and necessary expenses of inspecting and supervising the poles and wires imposed upon the borough of New Hope, and was largely in excess thereof, and the fee was also largely in excess of any additional liability of that kind and character imposed upon the borough in looking after the safety of the poles and wires and to see that they were properly maintained, and was also in excess of any further liability which might or could arise to the borough by reason of any [57] injuries *to persons or property which might arise, or may have arisen, by reason of the erection of the poles and the stringing of the wires within the limits of the borough. It was further stated that the charges were more than ten times the amount of all kinds and character of expenses and liability which might have been incurred by the borough by reason of these poles and wires, and that, in view of those circumstances, the assessing of the license tax upon the telegraph company was for the purpose of raising and producing revenue, and was therefore void.

The company averred that it had paid the commonwealth of Pennsylvania all taxes upon the value of its poles and wires, as included in and represented by its capital and upon the gross receipts derived from the use thereof, and it had paid its taxes upon its property in the borough of New Hope. That the expenses incurred by the borough during the period covered by the claim practically amounted to nothing, so far as regarded inspection and supervision.

The parties proceeded to trial, and the borough having proved the passage of the ordinance, and the number of poles and the number of miles of wire as claimed in the complaint, thereupon rested.

The defendant proved that the only work done by the employees of the borough in regard to the poles and wires of the company during the four years included in the claim was to count the poles each year for the purpose of assessing the tax; that no other service on the part of the borough was performed under its police powers, or at all, in regard to inspection. The defendant also showed that it was an interstate telegraph company; that it had no public office in the borough, nor had there been any commercial office therein during the time in question; that there was no office in which business was received for which tolls were charged.

It was proved, also, that the entire value of the line of the company in the borough of New Hope (that is, the cost of the material and construction) amounted to less [58] than $800, and *that the claim of the borough, graduated by the number of poles in the borough and the number of miles of wire strung on them, amounted to $138 per year, or to 17 per centum of the cost of the line in the borough.

The company also proved that it employed servants, whose duty it was to erect the poles, and string the wires, and inspect and watch them, and keep them in proper repair and in safe condition; that the authorities of the borough did nothing whatever in the way of inspection of the lines.

The trial judge charged the jury, among other things, that the question which arose in the evidence in the case was that of the validity of the ordinance, to be determined by the amount and character of the charges against the company; that the borough had the right to enact such police regulations as might be necessary and reasonable in the government of the town, but in regard to the taxing question it had no right to go beyond the exercise of what was termed its police power; that if the ordinance was unreasonable in amount, it was void; that the power to demand the license fee must be exercised as a means of regulation, and cannot be used as a source of revenue, and that, when exacted as a police power, it must be limited to the necessary and proper expenses of issuing the license and of inspecting and regulating the business the license covers; that the borough had the right to impose such conditions and regulations as are necessary for the general protection of the streets and the uses of the same in the borough; that in doing this the borough could not be questioned, provided the license fee was a reasonable and just one, and a proper one under the circumstances, and commensurate with the probable requirements and exercise of the police or supervisory power of the borough. The court then said that it had a great deal of doubt as matter of fact and law as to whether this was a reasonable subjection or not, and it was frank to say:

"That we are inclined to the view that this is an arbitrary imposition of a license or tax rate. But it appears that our *brethren [59] upon the bench in other localities have adjudged that similar rates are not unreasonable or unnecessary; but it is argued upon the part of the defense that in those cases there was not the same proof as has been developed here. There was not shown as clearly as there is here that the amount of money received as the result of the license was a clear revenue, irrespective of any requirement for police regulation. In other words, that this borough seems to have imposed a license fee to be expended and used in the exercise of a power and a duty which it has failed to exercise at all. Now then, gentlemen, while the question as to whether an ordinance is reasonable or not is for the court, and the court does not propose to evade that question, yet I have concluded to obtain the assistance and judgment of this jury as to whether an assessment, such as this is, under the circumstances of this case, is reasonable or unreasonable under the law, as I have laid it down, for this surely involves the facts. Now, if you believe that it is unreasonable according to the facts, you will render a verdict for the defendant; if you believe that it is reasonable and should be paid in the full amount, you will render a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of its claim, and the court hereafter will regulate judgment in accordance with such views, either upon a motion for a new trial or otherwise, as we shall entertain after having this opinion from you, in aid of its judgment, and to determine the doubt on the facts."

The court further stated:

"The borough of New Hope had no right to impose any charge for the privilege of erecting and maintaining said poles and wires in said borough except only such sum as will reasonably cover and reimburse to it the expense to it which it may be subjected in consequence of the erection and maintenance of said poles and wires, and if the license fees sued for in this case exceed said sum, your verdict shall be for the defendant."

Instead of finding a verdict for the amount due under the ordinance, or else a verdict for the defendant, as directed by [60] the court, the jury on October 17, 1899, found a verdict for $466.40. The trial judge directed judgment to be entered for the borough for the amount of the verdict. From that judgment an appeal was taken by the company to the superior court of Pennsylvania, which affirmed the same, that court holding that, the facts being undisputed, the question of the validity of the ordinance was for the court to decide, and that if, on the undisputed facts, the court would not have been warranted in declaring the ordinance void, the submission of the question of its reasonableness to the jury was an error of which the defendant had no just right to complain, and the court held that it would not have been justified by the precedents in declaring the ordinance void.

The supreme court affirmed the judgment of the superior court, and upon the question that the verdict of the jury was for a less sum than the ordinance called for, said that was a matter of which, under the view of the law taken by the court (that the question of reasonableness was for it), the plaintiff might complain, but that it was such good luck for the defendant that it might well rest satisfied. The company thereupon sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Frank R. Shattuck argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William C. Ryan argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

The ground upon which an ordinance of this nature may be upheld is stated in the two cases of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New Hope, 187 U. S. 419, 47 L. ed. 240, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204, and Atlantic & P. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. 995, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817.

The trial court held that the question whether the ordinance in this case was reasonable or not was one for the court, but he submitted it to the jury for their aid, and as advisory only, the court stating to the [61] jury that it would thereafter regulate the judgment to be entered in accordance with such views as the court might entertain as to the reasonableness of the ordinance, and after having the benefit of the assistance of the jury upon that question.

The direction to the jury was to give a verdict for the full sum, if they thought that the ordinance was reasonable, and if not,—that is, if the jury thought that the ordinance was not reasonable,—then the verdict should be for the defendant. The jury did not obey that direction. It returned a verdict for a considerably less sum than was due if the ordinance were valid, and by such verdict (regard being had to the charge of the judge) it necessarily found the license fee provided for in the ordinance was unreasonable and the ordinance itself invalid. The verdict is, therefore, simply evidence of what the jury conceived to be a reasonable sum, which it thereupon proceeded to assess by its verdict, and being much less than the ordinance called for. It made itself a taxing body, the verdict being the result of its own views as to what the fees should have been. When the verdict was rendered, and the court directed judgment to be entered thereon, it must have thereby concurred with the jury, and held the ordinance unreasonable and therefore void. Otherwise, if the ordinance was valid, the court would have directed judgment for the full sum, without reference to the verdict. Finding, therefore, that the ordinance was void, instead of directing judgment for the defendant, the court followed the jury, and directed judgment for the sum which the court regarded as reasonable, being the same sum found by the jury. This follows, because the court had theretofore stated that, in its view, this ordinance was an arbitrary imposition of a license tax, and the court also announced that the verdict of the jury was not conclusive, and would be acted upon by him in accordance with such views as he might entertain after the verdict was rendered. But neither the court nor the jury had any power whatever to give judgment for what either might regard a reasonable sum, if that *sum were less than the amount provided for in the ordinance. The source of jurisdiction to give any verdict or judgment for the plaintiff was the ordinance. If the amount of the license fee provided for therein was unreasonable, the ordinance was void, and there was no power in either jury or court to substitute its own judgment as to what was reasonable, and to give a verdict or direct a judgment to be entered for that sum. Finding the sum named in the ordinance unreasonable, the verdict or judgment should have been for the defendant.

The argument that plaintiff alone can complain that the verdict is too small is not well founded in this instance. It is undoubtedly the general rule that a verdict or judgment for a less sum for the plaintiff than he is entitled to under the evidence is matter of complaint for him alone, and if acquiesced in by him the defendant has no cause to complain that he is charged for a less sum than he ought to have been. On grounds already stated the reasons do not apply in a case like this.

Both the superior and the supreme courts of Pennsylvania proceeded in their decisions upon the theory that the question was for the court, and that the ordinance was valid; but as the jury had found a less sum than provided for by the ordinance, the judgment might stand, and the defendant could not in such event complain that the judgment was too small. Those courts in effect reverse the finding of the jury that the ordinance was unreasonable and void, while at the same time maintaining a judgment based upon such finding.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New Hope, 187 U. S. 419, 47 L. ed. 240, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204, the question of the reasonableness of the license fee exacted was left to the jury, and the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered thereon, which was affirmed by the state courts upon appeal. Upon writ of error from this court the case was reviewed here, and it was held that, as the jury and the court of common pleas, the superior court, and the supreme court of Pennsylvania had all held the ordinance reasonable, this court would *not say it was so manifestly wrong as to justify our interpolation.

There is a difference, however, between such a case and one like this, where the jury and the trial court have, in effect, held the ordinance void, and a judgment has been entered which is unauthorized in any event, and which should have been for the defendant. Where it is a question of amount in an ordinance in a case like this, we have held that it is not improper to submit that question to a jury, although in general the reasonableness of an ordinance is matter of law for the court. Atlantic & P. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. 995, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817.

In the case cited it was stated by Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, at page 166, L. ed. p. 1001, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 819, as follows:

"It may be conceded that, generally speaking, whether an ordinance be reasonable is a question for the court. As said by Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. vol. 1, § 327: 'Whether an ordinance be reasonable and consistent with the law or not is a question for the court, and not the jury, and evidence to the latter on this subject is inadmissible.' While that may be correct as a general statement of the law, and especially in cases in which the question of reasonableness turns on the character of the regulations prescribed, yet when it turns on the amount of a license charge it may rightly be left for the determination of a jury. There are many matters which enter into the consideration of such a question, not infrequently matters which are disputed, and in respect to which there is contradictory testimony."

We think that in this case, like that just cited, it was not improper to submit the question to the jury, and that the verdict necessarily found the license fee exacted by the ordinance unreasonable, and the ordinance itself was therefore void. The jury could not itself assess a tax and render verdict for the amount it might judge reasonable. A judgment entered upon such a verdict for the amount thereof was improper and illegal, as it should have been for the defendant, the ordinance being void.

*The judgment of the Supreme Court of [64] Pennsylvania should be reversed and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

BOROUGH OF TAYLOR.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 64-73.)

Commerce—validity of state tax on telegraph poles and wires.

An ordinance imposing a license fee on the poles and wires of an interstate telegraph company is not a valid exercise of the police power, where the municipality has made no inspection, and has neither paid out any money nor incurred any expense for that purpose, and the fee is twenty times the amount of any expense that might have been reasonably and fairly incurred to make the most careful, thorough, and efficient inspection and supervision possible, and for all measures and precautions that possibly could be required to be taken by the municipality for the safety of its citizens and the public.

Argued December 11, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Superior Court of that State, which had affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, awarding to a municipality the amount of a license fee imposed by it upon the poles and wires of an interstate telegraph company. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 202 Pa. 583, 52 Atl. 128.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The plaintiff in error seeks to review the judgment of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, which affirmed the judgment of the superior court of that state, which in its turn affirmed the judgment of the court of common pleas of Lackawanna county, in favor of the defendant in error in an action brought by it to recover the amount of a license fee imposed upon all telegraph, telephone, and electric light companies having poles and wires in the borough. The ordinance was of the same nature as that mentioned in the immediately preceding case of Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. New Hope, 192 U. S. 55, ante, 338, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204.

NOTE.—On corporate taxation in the United States as affected by the commerce clause in the Federal Constitution—see note to Sandford v. Poe, 60 L. R. A. 641.

As to the validity of charges on telegraph and telephone poles and wires—see note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New Hope, 47 L. ed. U. S. 240.

By the plaintiff's statement of its claim against the defendant, the telegraph company, it sought to recover from the company the sum of $220.50, including interest from January 31, 1898.

*The defendant is a corporation engaged [65] in interstate commerce by transmitting telegraphic communications among the several states, and by its affidavit of defense it averred that it was a company engaged in forwarding telegraphic dispatches among the several states, and was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York; that it had paid the commonwealth of Pennsylvania all taxes which had by legislative enactment been levied upon the value of its poles and wires erected and maintained in the borough of Taylor and elsewhere in the state; that it had accepted the act of Congress (14 Stat. at L. 221, chap. 230), providing for the construction of telegraph lines over any post road of the United States; that it had never maintained, and does not now maintain, any office whatever in the borough of Taylor, and that no telegraphic business of any kind is done or transacted by the defendant in that borough, except the maintenance of the telegraphic lines and the transmission of telegraphic messages over the same from other places; that the ordinance in question is unreasonable, unjust, and excessive, and is illegal and void, because it is designed and intended to provide revenue by taxation for the general expenses of the borough, and that no other object than this exists, or has at any time existed, for the regulations imposed by the ordinance; that the borough is under no expense whatever in issuing the license required by the ordinance, and has not been at any time before, during, or after the period mentioned in the plaintiff's statement for which it makes demand, under any expense or charge of any kind whatsoever in inspecting and regulating the poles and wires; that the license fees imposed by the ordinance are not based upon the cost and expense to the borough for inspection and supervision or regulation of the defendant's lines and business, but the fees are imposed notwithstanding they are more than twenty times the amount that might have been or could possibly be incidental to such inspection, supervision, and regulation, together with all reasonable measures and precautions that might have been or possibly could be required to be taken by *the said borough for the safety of [66] its citizens and the public, or which might have been or possibly could be incurred as expenses for the most careful, thorough, and efficient inspection and supervision that might have been made of the poles and wires of the defendant, although the plaintiff has not and does not maintain any inspection and supervision or care whatsoever over the poles and wires of the defendant, and has incurred no expense whatever on account thereof; that the borough is a sparsely populated district, and the land therein of small value, and most of the land along the highway on which the telegraph lines are constructed is not adapted to building purposes nor commercial use, and the highway is little traveled; that the borough is a coal-mining community and the buildings therein consist for the most part of the coal miners' cabins or houses of one or two stories, and the business buildings are scattered and consist mostly of small shops or stores; that the poles and wires thereon are located on the side of the highway and do not interfere in the slightest degree or to any extent with its use for all highway purposes, and do not interfere with any kind of traffic or with the operation of men or apparatus in extinguishing fires; that the line is not old, decayed, or worn out, but, on the contrary, is comparatively new and sound, and there is no danger of accident from the decay or breaking down of the poles and wires; that the license fees imposed by the ordinance are twenty times more than could be imposed under any power existing in the borough to make charges for all legal purposes; that the amount of the license fees imposed under the ordinance for each year largely exceeds the entire cost to the defendant itself of maintaining said line, including all repairs, reconstruction, cost of labor and material, and traveling expenses of the employees, and all expenses incurred by the defendant by a careful and efficient inspection and maintenance of such poles and wires; that the fees imposed by the ordinance are so excessive that if every borough in the state of Pennsylvania in which defendant has a telegraph system should pass similar ordinances the total amount collected *would exceed $100,000 per annum, and if the same kind of an ordinance should be passed in the other states by the municipalities in which the poles and lines of the company are placed it could not pay the amount, but would become insolvent by reason of the fact that the expenses of operation, including the license fees, would be far in excess of the receipts of the defendant.

[67] To this affidavit of defense the plaintiff excepted on the ground that it did not state any sufficient defense to plaintiff's cause of action, and also on the ground of res judicata, in that the same questions had been theretofore decided between the same parties in the courts of the state.

A rule for judgment was taken by the plaintiff for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, and, upon hearing, the rule was made absolute (the facts set forth in the affidavit of defense being thereby assumed), and judgment for the plaintiff being entered, it was affirmed by the superior and supreme courts of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Frank R. Shattuck argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

What is reasonable in one municipality may be oppressive and unreasonable in another. In determining this question the court will have to regard all the circumstances of the particular city or corporation, the objects sought to be obtained, and the necessity which exists for the ordinance. Regulations proper for a large and prosperous city might be absurd or oppressive in a small and sparsely populated town, or in the country.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement of facts, delivered the opinion of the court:

The grounds of our jurisdiction to review the judgment in this and the preceding case are similar to those which sustained it in the two cases of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New Hope, 187 U. S. 419, 47 L. ed. 240, 23

Sup. Ct. Rep. 204, and Atlantic & Pacific Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 45 L. ed. 995, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817. By reference to the opinions delivered in the state courts in this case it is apparent that it was not decided upon any question of res judicata, as set forth in the plaintiff's exceptions to defendant's affidavit of defense.

*In the opinion of the superior court of [68] Pennsylvania it was stated:

"Whether or not the fee is so obviously excessive as to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that it is exacted as a return for the use of the streets, or is imposed for revenue purposes, is a question for the courts, and is to be determined upon a view of the facts, not upon evidence consisting of the opinions of witnesses as to the proper supervision that the municipal authorities might properly exercise, and the expense of the same. Such a decision becomes a precedent which is to be regarded in other cases similarly situated. Were it to be held otherwise, the law upon the subject would be in hopeless confusion and uncertainty. We make these remarks because we cannot escape the conclusion that some of the averments of the affidavit of defense are, in reality, but the opinion of the defendant, undoubtedly honestly entertained, as to these matters. They are not stronger than the averments in Philadelphia v. American U. Teleg. Co. 167 Pa. 406, 31 Atl. 628, and the other facts averred do not distinguish the case from others in which a similar fee in boroughs has been held to be not so obviously excessive as to warrant the courts in declaring the ordinance void. The cases are collected in the opinion filed herewith in the case of New Hope v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 202 Pa. 532, 52 Atl. 127." [Reported in 202 Pa. 583, 52 Atl. 128.]

The opinion referred to by the superior court is also contained in the record, and cases were cited in that opinion from the state courts holding that they would not declare an ordinance void because of the alleged unreasonableness of the fee charged, unless the unreasonableness be so clearly apparent as to demonstrate an abuse of discretion on the part of the municipal authorities. The court further remarked:

"In many of the foregoing cases the license fee was the same as that imposed by the ordinance under consideration. In none of the cases was the ordinance declared void for unreasonableness, although it was inferentially conceded that a case might arise where the license fee would be so grossly disproportionate *to the burden imposed upon [69] the municipality in consequence of the erection and maintenance of the poles and wires as to warrant the court in presuming that the ordinance was a revenue measure, not a police regulation. None of the cases laid down a fixed and invariable rule by which that question is to be determined, but after a comparison of the facts developed on the trial of this case with the facts of some of the cases above cited, we have been led to the conclusion that the court would not have been justified by the precedents in declaring the ordinance void."

Upon the averments in the affidavit of defense, which in this proceeding must be taken to be true, we can come to no other conclusion than that the ordinance was void because of the unreasonable amount of the license fee provided for therein.

It was urged on the argument that this ordinance was a proper police regulation, and that the collection of revenue was not its object; that it was the duty of the borough officials to protect the lives and property of its citizens, and that in the discharge of such duty it had the right to constantly inspect the poles and wires for the purpose of seeing that they were safe.

There is no doubt that, for the purpose mentioned, the borough had the right claimed by its counsel. The averments of the affidavit of defense, however, show that no such duty has been discharged or attempted to be discharged by the borough. It has done absolutely nothing to protect the lives or property of its citizens by inspecting the poles and wires of the defendant.

In Atlantic & Pacific Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. 995, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817, it was held that the testimony in a case like this might be such as to compel a decision one way or the other, and the court might then be justified in directing a verdict. We think this is one of those cases. We assume that a tax of this kind ought to be large enough to cover all expenses of police supervision of the property and instrumentalities used by the company in the borough, and that it is not [70] bound to furnish such supervision *for nothing, but may, in addition to ordinary property taxation, subject the corporation to a charge for the expenses of the supervision. The borough is also not compelled to make its expenditures for these purposes in advance of demanding the tax from the defendant, but it must be remembered that such a tax is authorized only in support of police supervision; and, if it were possible to prove in advance the exact cost, that sum would be the limit of the law. As, in the nature of things, this is ordinarily impossible, the municipality is at liberty to make the charge enough to cover any reasonably anticipated expenses, and the payment of the fee cannot be avoided because it may subsequently appear that it was somewhat in excess of the actual expense of the supervision, nor can the company then recover the difference between the amount of the license fee and such cost. These observations are substantially reproduced from the opinion of the court in Atlantic & Pacific Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 47 L. ed. 995, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817, delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer.

We come, then, to an examination of the question whether this fee, in the light of the admitted facts set forth in the affidavit of defense, can, by the widest stretch of imagination, be regarded as reasonable. The borough is, where the poles are planted and the wires stretched, sparsely settled, and the danger to be apprehended from neglect in regard to the poles and wires is reduced to a minimum. The borough has in fact done nothing in the way of inspection or supervision during the time covered by the license in question. It has not expended one dollar for any such purpose. It has incurred no liability to pay any expenses arising from inspection or supervision on its behalf. The fee itself is twenty times the amount of expense that might have been reasonably and fairly incurred to make the most careful, thorough, and efficient inspection and supervision that might have been made of such poles and wires, and for all reasonable measures and precautions that possibly could be required to be taken by the borough for the safety of its citizens and the public. This is not a mere expression *of opinion. It is the averment of [71] a fact. The company knows the amount it costs for the inspection, which it avers is made by its own servants, and which it avers is a most careful and efficient inspection, one intended to place and maintain the poles and wires in a perfectly safe and satisfactory condition. Knowing that cost, and comparing it with the amount demanded under the ordinance, it is enabled to state as a fact, and not as a mere opinion, that the amount of the license fee exacted under the ordinance is, as stated, twenty times more than it ought to be to secure a reasonable, efficient, and most careful inspection, as set forth in the affidavit mentioned.

In Chester City v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 Pa. 464, 25 Atl. 1134, cited in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New Hope, 187 U. S. 419, 425, 47 L. ed. 240, 244, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204, it was said that the affidavit in that case averred that the rates charged were at least five times the amount of the expenses involved in the supervision exercised by the municipality. The supreme court held that while that averment must be admitted to be true, it did not go far enough, because it referred only to the usual, ordinary, and necessary expenses of the municipal officers in issuing the license and other expenses thereby imposed upon the municipality, and that it made no reference to the liability imposed upon the city by the erection of the telegraph poles. It was also stated by the court that it is the duty of the city to see that the poles are safe and properly maintained, and should a citizen be injured in person or property by reason of the neglect of such duty an action might lie against the city for the consequences of such neglect. The court said it was a mistake, therefore, to measure the reasonableness of the charge by the amount actually expended by the city in a particular year to the particular purposes specified in the affidavit.

The affidavit in this case goes much further. It includes not only the expenses that might have been incurred for an ordinary inspection, supervision, and regulation, but takes into account the very matters [72] that are spoken of in the extract from *the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania (supra). Instead of the averment that the license fee charged was at least five times the amount of the expense involved in the supervision exercised by the municipality, it is stated that it is more than twenty times the amount that would reasonably be expended for the purposes stated in the affidavit.

The liability to pay for injuries that might arise from the bad condition of the poles and wires, arising from the neglect of the company to inspect and supervise the same, is not a liability which the municipality is entitled to recover from the company in advance of its happening, but it is simply one of the reasons for an inspection by the borough, which shall be most carefully and continuously performed, in order that injuries may not arise from the neglect of such supervision.

When we come to an examination of the grounds upon which this kind of a tax is justifiable, and when we find that, in this case, each one of those grounds is absent, how is it possible to uphold the validity of such an ordinance? To uphold it in such a case as this is to say that it may be passed for one purpose and used for another; passed as a police inspection measure and used for the purpose of raising revenue; that the enactment as a police measure may be used as a mere subterfuge for the purpose of raising revenue, and yet, because it is said to be an inspection measure, the court must take it as such and hold it valid, although resulting in a rate of taxation which, if carried out throughout the country, would bankrupt the company were it added to the other taxes properly assessed for revenue and paid by the company. It is thus to be declared legal upon a basis and for a reason that do not exist in fact.

We think the court is not bound to acknowledge an ordinance such as this to be valid in face of the facts stated in the affidavit of defense. Confessedly there has been here no inspection, no expense incurred to provide for one even though not made, and all expenses and liabilities that might fairly and reasonably be incurred on the part of the borough are not one twentieth of the amount it exacts for an inspection which it has not made. *Under such facts it would [73] seem to be plain that the ordinance was adopted as a means for the raising of revenue, and not to repay expenses for inspection.

Judging the intention of the borough by its action, it did not intend to expend anything for an inspection of the poles and wires, and did intend to raise revenue under the ordinance. Courts are not to be deceived by the mere phrasology in which the ordinance is couched, when the action of the borough, in the light of the facts set forth in the affidavit, shows conclusively that it was not passed to repay the expenses or provide for the liabilities incurred in the way of inspection or for proper supervision.

We are of opinion that, upon the averments contained in the defendant's statement of defense, the defendant was entitled to judgment. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

the United States to review a judgment of the highest court of a state sustaining a license tax imposed on a banking business cannot be defeated on the theory that such judgment rests upon non-Federal grounds sufficient to sustain it, even assuming that the state court rests its decision upon the grounds that by reason of the bank's acceptance of a certain state statute, and by virtue of an act extending its charter, it became subject to certain constitutional provisions authorizing or requiring the payment of such a tax, where the bank pleaded that at the time of the imposition of the tax it had a contract exemption from taxation.

The contract exemption from any tax on the capital stock of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, created by the provisions of its charter as amended by La. act January 30, 1836, § 4, that "the capital of said bank shall be exempt from any tax," must be deemed to include an exemption from the imposition of a license tax for the carrying on of the banking business,—especially since the bank was incorporated to aid the agricultural interests of the state, and the state assisted by a loan of its credit, and retained partial control of the bank's directorate.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a judgment which reversed a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans sustaining the defense of a bank to a suit for the recovery of a license tax, based upon a claim of a contract exemption from taxation. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 52 La. Ann. 1086, 27 So. 709.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

This suit was instituted in the civil district court for the parish of Orleans for the recovery of the sum of $2,400, claimed to be due from the bank for the year 1894 as a license tax for carrying on a banking business. The license is claimed to have been authorized by the following provision of act No. 150 of the general assembly of Louisiana of 1890: "That for each business of carrying on a bank, banking company, association, corporation, or agency, the license shall be based on the declared or nominal capital and surplus, whether said capital and surplus is owned, or in use, or on deposit in the state or elsewhere, as follows, to wit: . . . Ninth class. When the said declared or nominal capital and surplus is four hundred thousand dollars or more, and under six hundred thousand dollars, the license shall be four hundred and fifty dollars ($450.)" [La. Rev. Laws, p. 835.]

The bank pleaded the general issue and that it was exempt from paying such license by the provisions of its charter, granted in 1833, and by § 4 of the act of January 30, 1836, amending the charter, by which it was provided that "the capital of said bank shall be exempt from any tax laid by the state, or by any parish or body politic, under the authority of the state, during the continuance of its charter." It was alleged that the charter of 1833 and the amendment of 1836 were granted for a valuable consideration, and constituted a contract between the state and the bank, and that the act imposing the license impaired the obligation of the contract, and was therefore violative of the Constitution of the United States. Certain judgments were also plead-^[75] ed as res judicata and introduced in evidence, one of which was the decree of this court in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905.

The trial court sustained the defense of the bank, based on its claim under its charter, but did not pass on the plea of res judicata. The court observed: "I pass only on the main issue raised, without reference to the defendant's plea of res judicata, inasmuch as it does not appear that the issue of exemption from a license tax has been presented in any of the cases and judgments relied on to support the plea."

Judgment was entered, dismissing the demand of the state. It was reversed on appeal to the supreme court, the court, however, dividing. 52 La. Ann. 1086, 27 So. 709. Elaborate opinions were delivered both by the majority and minority of the court. All of the contentions of the bank were held to be untenable, but the members of the majority did not agree upon the grounds. Mr. Justice Monroe, with whom concurred the Chief Justice, placed his decision on three grounds: (1) The plea of res judicata could not be sustained, because the validity of a license tax was not involved in the decrees or judgments pleaded. (2) License taxes were distinguishable from taxes on property, and the bank was not exempt from the former by its charter. (3) The act of 1874, extending the charter from 1884 to 1911, was to take effect in 1884, from which it was deduced: "First, that the extension thus granted could add nothing not authorized by the constitution of 1868, under the dominion of which the act was passed, and which required the payment of a license; second, that the grant, to take effect in 1884, became subject to the constitution adopted in 1879, which also required, or authorized the legislature to require, the payment of the license." (4) Even if this were not so, the acceptance by the bank of the act No. 79 of 1880 "specifically and in terms subjected it to the Constitution of 1879, and thereby placed it out of the power of the legislature to exempt it from the payment of the license imposed on other institutions of the same class."

[76] *Mr. Justice Watkins delivered a separate opinion, and placed his concurrence on the distinction between a license tax and a property tax, and said that "the conclusion is perfectly clear that a property tax was only in contemplation of the legislature in framing that exemption." And also said that the license law under which the state proceeded "does not conflict with the contract clause of the Federal Constitution by impairing the contract rights of the defendant bank under its charter." Concluding his opinion, the learned justice observed:

"In my view, it is unnecessary for this court to go into any discussion of the constitutional questions raised and adverted to in the opinion of the majority, for the reason that, on the face of the charter exemption, which the bank pleads, its liability is apparent.

"It is my view, also, that the better course of decision is, and one more in harmony with the general jurisprudence of this court, to avoid discussion of Federal questions which only arise incidentally, and are unnecessary to the decision of the principal question at issue.

"Entertaining this view, I think it is preferable to pass the constitutional question under consideration, and reverse the judgment of the district court, and sustain the license on the face of the charter and the law."

Mr. Justice Breau and Mr. Justice Blanchard dissented, each filing an opinion.

Mr. Henry Denis argued the cause on the original argument, and, with Mr. Murphy J. Foster, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The charter exemption from taxation of the bank's capital co nomine has been recognized by this court.

The omission of the Citizens' Bank from the list of banks subject to license taxation was a clear recognition of the fact that, in the opinion of all the state officials who were concerned in the assessment, collection, and receipt of the state taxes, the Citizens' Bank was not liable to a license tax.

Mr. Henry Denis also argued the cause on reargument and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

It is judicially established by this court and by the courts of Louisiana that the bank did not, in accepting the act of 1880, waive its right of exemption.

The judgment of the supreme court of Louisiana in the case now before this court does not rest in any way upon a non-Federal ground, but exclusively upon the Federal question whether the imposition of a license tax upon the capital of the bank is in violation of its contractual exemption from all taxes.

Mr. Eugene D. Saunders also argued the cause for plaintiff in error on reargument.

Messrs. Henry Denis and Branch K. Miller filed a brief for plaintiff in error on motion to dismiss or affirm.

Mr. E. Howard McCaleb, Jr., argued the cause on original argument, and, with Mr. E. Howard McCaleb, filed a brief for defendant in error:

Jurisdiction to review a final judgment rendered by the highest court of a state is dependent upon a Federal issue necessarily involved and decided adversely to plaintiff in error. If, however, it appears that the decision rests upon two independent grounds, one Federal and the other non-Federal, and the latter is broad enough to support the judgment, the writ of error will be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, without reference to, or consideration of, the Federal issue.

In determining whether or not the tax is upon the exempted capital or upon the corporate business, the true test is, Does the tax affect the exempted capital directly or incidentally? If directly, it is objectionable; if incidentally, it is not. It has been said that incidental effects are common to all forms of taxation.

Mr. E. Howard McCaleb filed a separate brief for defendant in error on the motion to dismiss or affirm.

Mr. Justice McKenna, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. A motion is made to dismiss. The ground of it is that, even *if the charter of [77] 1833 and the amendment of 1836 exempted the bank from license taxes, the bank, by accepting the act of 1880, which enabled the bank to make compromises with its mortgage creditors, became subject to the Constitution of 1879, which, it is contended, authorized or required the legislature to impose a license tax. And, besides, the act of 1874, extending the charter, was subject to the constitution of 1868, and that required the payment of a license. Upon those grounds Mr. Justice Monroe based his opinion, and they, it is urged, involved state questions sufficient to sustain the judgment. But those grounds only had the concurrence of the Chief Justice. Mr. Justice Watkins did not assent to them and Justices Breaux and Blanchard dissented from them. The judgment of the court, therefore, does not rest upon them. The judgment rests upon the construction of the original charter,—that is, upon the contract between the state and the bank,—but to construe that is also our function.

But assuming that the judgment rests upon the grounds stated, we nevertheless have the power of review. The Federal question presented is, Did the bank, at the time of the imposition of the license tax sued for, have a contract with the state exempting it (the bank) from such tax? The elements of that question are the original contract and all subsequent legislation relating to the contract and which it is claimed modifies or changes it. The motion to dismiss is, therefore, denied.

2. The question presented on the merits has been simplified by the case of New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905. The origin and history of the bank are there detailed, its charter and its exemptions are construed, its litigations with the city are recited, and their effect declared. We need only apply and extend the reasoning of that case to decide this.

[78] It came here from the circuit court of the United States. It was brought in that court by a bill in equity to enjoin the taxing officers of the state and of the city of New Orleans from taxing the bank under certain provisions of a statute of the *state for the assessment of the capital of banks. Under the statute the capital stock of banks which were represented by shares were not assessed by that name, but the shares were required to be assessed to the stockholders at their actual valuation as shown by the books of the bank, and the taxes assessed were required to be paid by the bank, which was given the power to collect the amount from the shareholders or their transferees. The real estate owned by the bank was directed to be assessed directly to it and the tax "proportioned to each share of capital stock" and deducted from the amount of taxes of that share under the statute. The statute also contained provisions for its administration, and required property which had been omitted from the assessment rolls to be assessed for the current year and for three years back. The court adjudged the bank to be exempt from the taxation, and granted an injunction against the collection of the taxes for the designated years by the state of Louisiana, and the city of New Orleans, "upon the capital, property, or shares of stock of the shareholders of said bank, whether assessed against the bank or its shareholders."

The writ also enjoined the demanding or collecting from the bank of any state or city license tax. Commenting on the decree, this court said:

"The exemptions to which the decree below held the bank to be entitled related, therefore, to distinct objects of taxation, one not necessarily connected with or dependent upon the other, and may be summarized as follows: First. That the bank was not subject to taxation on its capital shares of stock or real estate, and furniture actually used for the carrying on of its banking business, and that the bank could not be lawfully obliged to pay the sum of any tax assessed on its shareholders. Second. That the stockholders of the bank were not liable for assessment on their shares of stock. Third. That the bank was also not subject to taxation on any real estate held by it which had been mortgaged to secure stock subscriptions and had become the property of the bank under foreclosure proceedings, *because property so acquired be-[79] came, by virtue of the purchase, a part of its capital stock. Fourth. That the nonliability of the bank to taxation embraced also immunity from the payment of a license tax to either the state of Louisiana or the city of New Orleans."

The decree was affirmed as to the objects of taxation embraced in the 1st subdivision, and reversed as to those embraced in the 2d, 3d, and 4th subdivisions. Of the objects in the 4th subdivision it was said:

"We are at a loss to understand by what process of reasoning the decree was made to cover the question of the nonliability of the bank for license. It was not presented by the pleadings, and was entirely dehors the issue in the case."

In sustaining the decree of the circuit court as to the objects in the first subdivision, necessarily there was involved the decision that the charter of the bank, both as originally granted and as extended, exempted the capital of the bank from taxation, and the exemption was not taken away by the constitutions of 1868 and 1879 by the acceptance of the act of 1874 by the bank, nor by the act of 1880. Many considerations were referred to which might have justified this as an independent conclusion, but the decision was mainly rested upon the judgments of the courts of Louisiana which had been pleaded as res judicata, and which judgments, it was decided, had concluded the controversies. There was a clear adjudication, therefore, of the right of exemption of the bank from a tax on its capital.

The ruling in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank has been followed by the supreme court of Louisiana. In Penrose v. Chaffraix, 106 La. 250, 256, 30 So. 718, 720, the same questions were raised on the statutes of 1874 and 1880 and the constitutions of 1868 and 1879, as are raised in the case at bar. The court, replying to them, said:

"Both these contentions were passed upon and negatived in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905, and the effect of that decision of the Supreme Court of the United States [80] is *to maintain and carry the exemption into the extended period of the bank's charter."

It is true that in a subsequent case (State v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 108 La. 603, 32 So. 965) New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank is criticized and its views are not concurred in as to what constitutes the thing adjudged and an estoppel in tax cases. But the thing claimed to have been adjudged was not a right claimed under the Constitution of the United States, and there was no intimation of disapproval of Penrose v. Chaffraix.

But if it can be contended that there is conflict between the state cases, New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank is, nevertheless, decisive of the questions adjudged by it. Deposit Bank v. Frankfort, 191 U. S. 499, ante, 276, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 154. And all the questions in the case at bar were adjudged by it except the question of the exemption of the bank from the payment of license taxes. That question is now presented, and we think the exemption exists. We deduce this not only from the words of the charter, but from the purpose of its enactment and of its extension. The bank was made an agency of the state. To have fostered it with aid and to have burdened it with taxation of any kind would have been inconsistent, considering the provisions of the act incorporating it, and it was immaterial whether it was constituted a quasi public corporation or entirely a private one. It was created to accomplish purposes in which the state took an interest, and the expectations which were entertained of it may be regarded in the interpretation of its charter. With the wisdom or folly of the charter we have nothing to do. Our sole function is to interpret it. It may seem, in 1903, to have been imprudent legislation. But how did it appear in 1833 and 1836? We must contemplate it as of that time. States act through men, and, of course, cannot have a greater appreciation or prophecy of things than men. Events may disappoint or baffle their purposes, but they cannot, for that reason, be relieved from their obligations. Nor can they necessarily be accused of folly. There are limits to the power of government, and the wisest provisions may be frustrated or turned to [81] *detriment by causes which no prescience can foresee. It is, therefore, to 1833 and 1836 we must turn, to the conditions and purposes of then.

The chief industry of Louisiana was agriculture, and it seemed to the state a wise policy to encourage and expand that industry, and the means selected was a bank which could make loans to the planters upon the security of their lands. Capital was necessary. Private persons were to be induced to subscribe, and the state aided by an issue and pledge of its bonds. It was careful to make provision for control. No act of administration could be undertaken without its consent. It was represented by six members on a board of twelve directors. It, besides, contemplated the probability of profits, and made provision to share them. The scheme was large and hazardous. Private capital had to be tempted to it, and the state, besides contributing its credit, offered the inducement of a relief from burdens. There is no doubt of this, and the dispute is only as to the degree, and, on an ambiguity which may be asserted upon a distinction in the form of taxation, a limitation is attempted to be put upon the comprehensive and expressive words of the bank's charter. This seems to us not justified. The words of the charter are "the capital of the bank shall be exempt from any tax." The word any excludes selection or distinction. It declares the exemption without limitation. And why should there have been limitation? What purpose was there to serve by making a distinction between the forms of taxation? The state did not intend to so limit its aid. It did not mean to help the bank to do business and then tax the business when done,—relieve it and burden it at the same time. Retain the right to impose as an occupation tax that which it gave up as a right to impose as a property tax.

This view is sustained by contemporaneous construction of the bank's charter. It was not only the immediate sense of the officers of the state, but their continued sense through a number of years, that the bank was exempt from all taxation, *and when the [82] right of taxation was asserted a license tax was not included. And we have authority for saying that a license tax was not demanded during a period of fifty-eight years, notwithstanding the many changes in the administrative officers of the state; that during all that time, "even from and inclusive of the very first revenue act (that of 1813), adopted after the admission of the state into the Union, license taxation as a means of revenue was provided for and enforced," and for a portion of the time (from 1869) license taxes were imposed upon banks.

Stress is put in the argument at bar upon the distinction between taxes on property and taxes on occupations. The distinction exists and counsel have cited Louisiana decisions in which that distinction has been held to justify license taxes, notwithstanding clauses in charters exempting capital stock from taxation. A review of those cases is not necessary. They were all rendered subsequently to 1836, and they depended upon the application of the constitution of 1868 or 1879, or special circumstances not applicable to the charter of the Citizens' Bank. And those cases did not embarrass the court in defining the scope of the charter of the Citizens' Bank in the decisions presently to be considered.

That the distinction between property taxes and license taxes was recognized in Louisiana in 1833 or 1836 is not very clear, but subsequently the distinction was certainly not always considered as justifying a power to impose license taxes. In New Orleans v. Southern Bank, 11 La. Ann. 41, the general law of the state, approved April 30, 1853, called the free banking law, was considered. The law provided "that bankers and banking companies, doing business under this act, shall be taxed upon their capital stock (italics ours) at the same rate as other personal property under the laws of the state." It was held that the provision was a contract with the individual corporations formed under the act, and a license tax imposed by the common council of the city under an act passed in 1842 (Session Acts [83] of 1842, p. 17), which *empowered the city to levy a license tax on certain enumerated occupations and "all other callings, professions, or business," was illegal.

The same question was presented again in State v. Southern Bank, 23 La. Ann. 271, upon a license tax imposed by the revenue laws of 1889. The court was urged to overrule New Orleans v. Southern Bank. The court refused to do so and affirmed the doctrine of that case, and held the act "violative of § 10, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States." The supreme court of Louisiana, therefore, as early as 1853, construed a provision exempting the capital stock of a bank from taxation except at a particular rate as exempting the bank from a license tax. In other words, it was held that a license tax was virtually a tax on the capital of the banks, and, we think, that must be held of the tax in the case at bar. Whatever the tax may be called,—one on property or one on occupations,—if its final incidence is on the capital, it is comprehended in the exemption contained in the charter. As we have already pointed out, the language of the charter is universal; and it was said in Citizens' Bank v. Bouny, 32 La. Ann. 239, "That language is broad enough to cover everything which, during its existence, should enter into and make part of the capital of said bank." If the language is broad enough to preclude a tax upon that which may become part of the capital of the bank, it is broad enough to preclude a tax which may become a burden upon the capital. Whatever diminishes the income of a bank diminishes its capital under the provisions of the charter of 1833. It was said in the Bouny Case: "By the 29th section of the original charter, 'all the profits made by said corporation shall be added to and made a part of its capital,' except a certain fraction of any excess of profits over what was necessary to pay the bonds issued by the bank." And the sum of $159,238.62 accumulated profits were held not to be liable to taxation. And fully as significant was the exemption declared of the sum of $636,450, assessed to the shareholders of the bank as "value of capital *stock." It was said: "Even if the share-[84] holders be liable to taxation on their shares (upon which we express no opinion), under the peculiar and exceptionable nature of the charter of the Citizens' Bank, we think it cannot be forced to pay the taxes assessed to its shareholders." In other words, the burden of tax could not be put upon the bank, however it could be imposed upon the stockholders.

We may recur to Penrose v. Chaffraix. It was a proceeding to recover the payment of a tax for the year 1899, imposed upon a certain number of shares of the capital stock of the Citizens' Bank held by Chaffraix. Exemption was asserted under the clause of the bank's charter which we have quoted. This was one of the questions left open by this court in New Orleans v. Citizens Bank, and left open in the Bouny Case. The exemption, nevertheless, was sustained. It was recognized that in some jurisdictions, "including the Supreme Court of the United States," it was held that the exemption of the capital of a corporation from taxation does not of necessity include the exemption of the shareholders on their shares of stock. But the court considered that it was not necessary to approve or disapprove the doctrine, and rejected it as inapplicable to shares in the Citizens' Bank, because the intent of the legislature was otherwise. And that intent was deduced "not only from the words of the charter," but from the purposes for which the bank was instituted, and they were vividly described. Because of them, it was in effect said, and of the bank's relation to them and the state's relation to the bank, the state "granted the clause quoted above, exempting from taxation." And it was observed, "at that time the refined distinction between the capital and the capital stock of a corporation had not been made by the courts, or was at least unrecognized as yet in Louisiana." We see, therefore, that in the Bouny Case it was held that a tax on that which might become capital, or a tax which the bank would have to pay, is illegal. In the Chaffraix Case it is held that a tax which falls on the stockholders of the bank is illegal. In other [85] words, the *effect of the two cases is that a tax which falls upon the capital or is to be paid by the bank or its stockholders, is prohibited. A license tax has surely some one of those effects.

It is urged, however, that neither the Boumy Case nor the Chaffraix Case can be adduced as authoritative. The argument is that a judgment in the case at bar has become the law of the case, and that it cannot be affected by what was or has been decided in some other case, and that the judgment in the case at bar rested on non-Federal grounds which were sufficient to sustain it, to wit, the construction and application of the constitutions and statutes of that state. The argument is the same as that directed against our jurisdiction, and has been answered. When a contract is asserted, and the Constitution of the United States invoked to protect it, all of the elements which are claimed to constitute it are open to our review; and, also, all of that which is claimed to have taken it away. We are certainly not confined to the decision under review. To hold that would surrender the power of review. That decision, of course, claims our first and a most thoughtful consideration, but in the right to challenge it is the right to go outside of it, and certainly nothing can afford more light or persuasion than the utterances of the same tribunal on prior and subsequent occasions.

These propositions, then, are established: the exemption granted to the bank in 1833 and 1836 was not taken away by the acts extending its charter, and the application thereto of the constitutions of 1868 and 1879. This was the thing adjudged in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905.

The exemption of the charter includes a license tax. This, for the reasons stated, must be regarded as part of the contract between the state and the bank. And in reaching that conclusion the rule requiring a strict construction of statutes exempting property from taxation has not been infringed. We recognize the force and salutary character of the rule, but it must not be misunderstood. It is not a substitute for all other rules. It does not mean that when- [86] ever a controversy is or can *be raised of the meaning of a statute, ambiguity occurs, which immediately and inevitably determines the interpretation of the statute. The decisive simplicity of such effect is very striking. It conveniently removes all difficulties from judgment in many cases of con-troverted construction of laws. But we cannot concede such effect to the rule, nor is such effect necessary in order to make the rule useful and, at times, decisive. Its proper office is to help to solve ambiguities, not to compel an immediate surrender to them,—to be an element in decision, and effective, maybe, when all other tests of meaning have been employed which experience has afforded, and which it is the duty of courts to consider when rights are claimed under a statute. Will courts ever be exempt, or have they ever been exempt, from that duty? Has skill in the use of language ever been so universal, or will it ever be so universal, as to make indubitably clear the meaning of legislation? Has forecast of events ever been so sure, or will it ever be so sure, as to make inevitably certain all the objects contemplated by a statute? We think not, and there never will be a time in which judicial interpretation of laws will not be invoked, and it cannot be omitted because a doubt may be asserted concerning the meaning of the legislators. We repeat, it is the judicial duty to ascertain if doubt exists.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Brewer, with whom the Chief Justice concurs, dissenting:

I dissent from the opinion and judgment in this case, and will state briefly my reasons therefor: Where it is contended that a state, having once entered into a contract, has, by subsequent legislation, impaired its obligations, this court, while exercising its independent judgment in respect to the terms of the contract and the fact of impairment, will lean to the views announced by the courts of that state. In Wilson v. Standefer, 184 U. S. 399, 412, 46 L. ed. 612, 618, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384, 389, we said:

“But as the general rule is that the in-[87]terpretation put on a state constitution or laws by the supreme court of such state is binding upon this court, and as our right to review and revise decisions of the state courts in cases where the question is of an impairment by legislation of contract rights is an exception, perhaps the sole exception, to the rule, it will be the duty of this court, even in such a case, to follow the decision of the state court when the question is one of doubt and uncertainty. Especial respect should be had to such decisions when the dispute arises out of general laws of a state, regulating its exercise of the taxing power, or relating to the state's disposition of its public lands. In such cases it is frequently necessary to recur to the history and situation of the country in order to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of the laws, and knowledge of such particulars will most likely be found in the tribunals whose special function is to expound and interpret the state enactments."

Where it is contended that exemption from taxation has been granted by contract with the state, the exemption, if any be found to exist, will not be extended by construction, but will be confined to that which is clearly within the terms of the contract. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, 544, 9 L. ed. 773, 822; Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416, 435, 14 L. ed. 997, 1005; *Dubuque & P. R. Co. v. In the last of these cases, on page 177, L. ed. p. 661, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 472, we said:

"It must always be borne in mind in construing language of this nature that the claim for exemption must be made out wholly beyond doubt; for, as stated by Mr. Justice Harlan, in Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. v. Guffey, 120 U. S. 569, 575, 30 L. ed. 732, 734, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, 696, 'It is the settled doctrine of this court that an immunity from taxation by a state will not be recognized unless granted in terms too plain to be mistaken.'"

[88] *And in next to the last, on page 146, L. ed. p. 649, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 460, we also said:

"These cases show the principle upon which is founded the rule that a claim for exemption from taxation must be clearly made out. Taxes being the sole means by which sovereignties can maintain their existence, any claim on the part of any one to be exempt from the full payment of his share of taxes on any portion of his property must, on that account, be clearly defined and founded upon plain language. There must be no doubt or ambiguity in the language used upon which the claim to the exemption is founded. It has been said that a well-founded doubt is fatal to the claim; no implication will be indulged in for the purpose of construing the language used as giving the claim for exemption, where such claim is not founded upon the plain and clearly expressed intention of the taxing power."

Only last term the same doctrine was reaffirmed in Chicago Theological Seminary v. Illinois, 188 U. S. 662, 672, 47 L. ed. 641, 648, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 386, 387, in these words:

"The rule is that, in claims for exemption from taxation under legislative authority, the exemption must be plainly and unmistakably granted; it cannot exist by implication only; a doubt is fatal to the claim."

I make these quotations, which are in harmony with the many other decisions of this court, for even the most casual examination of them makes it apparent that the rule therein stated is plainly ignored in this case, and that a term whose meaning is well understood is stretched beyond its ordinary significance and to its utmost limits in order to include the alleged exemption.

The supreme court of Louisiana in this case held that a license tax was not within the exemption of the bank from any tax upon its capital, the one being a charge for the privilege of carrying on the business, and the other an exemption of a part of the property of the bank from taxation. In the course of its opinion it said, after referring to a prior case:

"There the tax resisted, like those resisted in the cases relied on, was at least a tax of the same character; that is, a tax *upon[89] 'property,' while the tax involved in this litigation is one essentially different; it is a tax, it is true, but one upon callings or occupations, and it is controlled and governed by rules and principles entirely different from those which bear upon property taxation. New Orleans v. Louisiana Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 31 La. Ann. 638; Walters v. Duke, 31 La. Ann. 671; Morehouse v. Brigham, 41 La. Ann. 667, 6 So. 257. Articles 203, 206, 207, and 209 of the Constitution of 1879 also discloses this very fully and clearly. (See New Orleans v. Ernst, 35 La. Ann. 746, and State ex rel. Ernst v. State & City Board, 36 La. Ann. 347.)

"The defendant urges that the license tax is substantially one upon its capital. The views expressed by us above indicate our opinion upon this point. The mere reference in the license acts to the declared or nominal capital or surplus from business or banking institutions is not a tax upon the capital or surplus itself of the different banks, but a mere method of classifying the banks and establishing a graduation of licenses, as required by article 206 of the Constitution. State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins.

Co. 40 La. Ann. 463, 4 So. 504; Morehouse v. Bringham, 41 La. Ann. 666, 6 So. 257.

"This court, in New Orleans v. State Nat. Bank, 34 La. Ann. 892, said: 'A provision in the charter of a corporation exempting its stock and real estate from taxation does not cover an exemption from license taxation. The grant of a charter to a bank, authorizing it to carry on a certain business during the term of its charter, does not import permission to do so without contributing to the support of the government in like manner with natural persons pursuing the same business.'

"The extent of the exemption granted originally from taxation was from 'taxation upon its capital.' It could never have claimed greater or other exemption [90] than that. The law of *1890, the unconstitutionality of which is pleaded, does not pretend to impose, nor does it impose, any tax upon the 'bank's capital,' and therefore there could by no possibility be, nor is there, any violation of any contract obligation through that act, even should there really be any existing obligation at all between the state and the defendant as to taxation."

That there is a clear distinction between a property tax on the capital of a corporation and a license tax for the privilege of carrying on the business of the corporation has been so often decided by this and other courts, and is so clear, that it seems almost a waste of words to refer to decisions. And yet it may be well to refer to a few that it may be apparent how strongly, emphatically, and for how long a time the distinction has been affirmed. As a preliminary thereto let it be borne in mind that the franchise of a corporation is the privilege granted to it to do the business named in its charter, and a license tax for the privilege of doing business is simply a tax upon the franchise. In Gordon v. Appeal Tax Ct. 3 How. 133, 150, 11 L. ed. 529, 537, decided in 1844, it was said:

"A franchise for banking is in every state of the Union recognized as property. The banking capital attached to the franchise is another property, owned in its parts by persons, corporate or natural, for which they are liable to be taxed, as they are for all other property, for the support of government."

In Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 640, 18 L. ed. 904, 907:

"Property taxation and excise taxation, as authorized in the Constitution of the state, are perfectly distinct."

In Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 24 L. ed. 558, Mr. Justice Swayne, after referring to taxation of bank capital and shares of stock, added (p. 687, L. ed. p. 560):

"There are other objects in this connection liable to taxation. It may be well to advert to some of them.

"1. The franchise to be a corporation and exercise its powers in the prosecution of its business."

In Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 136, 29 L. ed. 830, 832, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645, 647, Chief Justice Waite declared:

"In corporations four elements of taxable value are sometimes found: 1, franchises; 2, capital stock in the hands of the corporation; 3, corporate property; and, 4, shares of the capital stock in the hands of the individual stockholders. Each of these is, under some circumstances, an appropriate subject of taxation; and it is no doubt within the power of a state, when not restrained by constitutional limitations, to assess taxes upon them in a way to subject the corporation or the stockholders to double taxation."

Both of these last cases were cited with approval in Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 161 U. S. 134, 146, 40 L. ed. 645, 649, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456. Many more cases might be cited to the same effect, but these will serve as illustrations. It is conceded that this distinction was recognized in Louisiana, though it is contended that it was not always held sufficient to uphold, in the case of a contract exemption of the capital, the retention of a power to impose license taxes, and some early decisions of the supreme court of that state are cited. But what does this argument amount to? Because the distinction between the two taxes has not always been recognized in Louisiana it must now be repudiated. The legislature must be held to have not recognized the distinction in this case, because the courts have sometimes in other cases failed to recognize it. It is not pretended that there has been a uniform ruling on the part of the supreme court of Louisiana ignoring the distinction. On the contrary, this very case (and this is only one of several) recognizes it. It seems to me this is a plain overturning of the hitherto settled rule of this court, that a doubt is to be resolved in favor of a state, for the alleged doubt in this particular case is resolved in favor of the corporation.

But upon what ground is it claimed that a doubt exists? Why should not the legislature be credited with recognizing the distinction recognized elsewhere through the country and sometimes at least, if not always, in Louisiana? It is said that there is something peculiar in the organization of this bank; that its purpose was to aid the agricultural interests of the *state, and that [92] the state assisted by a loan of its credit, and retained partial control through directors appointed by it. But is it not the rule that an exemption from taxation is not given as a gratuity, but by reason of some supposed benefit to the state as a whole or some particular interest therein? Does the fact that some interest in the state is specially benefited change the rule as to the construction of an exemption? It seems to me that that is a doctrine as novel as it is dangerous. It is true that the state loaned its credit, and retained a partial control through directors appointed by it, but we have in the legislation of Congress and in the decisions of this court a very suggestive analogy. The Union Pacific Railroad Company was a corporation chartered by Congress. It was given a large amount of public lands and the credit of the United States was loaned to it to the extent of $16,000 and over a mile. A partial control was retained through directors appointed by the government. In these respects it presents a close similarity to the Citizens' Bank. It was held by this court that while the franchise given by Congress to this and other trans-continental railroads was exempt from state taxation, yet the property belonging to those corporations was not. California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; Thomson v. Union P. R. Co. 9 Wall. 579, 19 L. ed. 792; Union P. R. Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. 5, 21 L. ed. 787. It was not doubted that Congress could in its discretion have provided for such exemption, but as it failed to prescribe it, the court held that it did not exist. If, from the fact that the corporation was aided by bonds of the United States, was engaged in doing the work of the nation in interstate transportation, and a partial control retained by Congress, that its property as well as its franchise was exempt from state taxation, why should there be an inference from the fact that Louisiana aided by its bonds this particular corporation and retained a partial control thereof, that it intended to grant any other exception than was expressly stated?

Again, it is contended that contemporaneous construction determines that the exemption of the capital included the *exemption of the franchise. It seems to me a sufficient answer is that in 1853 the supreme court held that a provision exempting the capital stock of a bank from taxation, except at a particular rate, exempted the bank from a license tax. New Orleans v. Southern Bank, 11 La. Ann. 41. It is not strange that thereafter there was no effort to impose a license tax on this bank and that the administrative officers respected the opinion of the supreme court, and did not until of late seek a reconsideration of that ruling.

It also appears that there was no specific statute providing for a license tax upon banks until 1869, and that was after the decision of the supreme court referred to.

It is also said that if a license tax on the franchise is enforced it must be paid out of the capital, and so, in effect, be a tax upon the capital. That argument would make in every case an exemption of the capital a relief from all taxation, for every tax must in the last analysis come out of the capital. But what, under those circumstances, becomes of the doctrine of a strict construction of a contract exemption of taxes?

Further, it must be remembered that objects and means of taxation were not in the years past sought for with the same avidity as at present. The demand for revenue was not so great, and there was much inattention to the matter of securing objects and devising modes of taxation. So the mere fact that a particular kind of tax was not sought to be enforced upon any institution is not conclusive of the fact that it was necessarily exempt therefrom. It may simply mean that other objects seemed to the taxing authorities more accessible and more conveniently reached for taxation. At any rate, we are not justified in holding that the mere fact of an omission to press such a taxation upon the bank establishes that such a tax was included within the exemption in the face of a ruling of the highest court of the state that it was not.

For these reasons I am constrained to dissent from the opinion of the court.

Mr. Justice Harlan also dissents.

*FERDINAND M. JOPLIN, Individually[94] and as Administrator of the Succession of Bennet Joplin, Plff. in Err.,
v.

THEODORE C. CHACHERE, John P. Boagni, and Victor C. Sittig.

Public lands—when title passes—prescription.

The confirmation by commissioners appointed under the act of Congress of March 3, 1807 (2 Stat. at L. 440, chap. 36), of a claim to 913.98 acres of land in the territory of Orleans, based on occupancy and settlement, followed by the confirmation by Congress in the act of April 29, 1816 (3 Stat. at L. 329, chap. 159), of the claim so confirmed, and by a survey, passed title so as to permit prescription, founded on uninterrupted possession, to begin to run before the patent issued.

Argued December 16, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a judgment which affirmed a decree of the Eighteenth Judicial District Court, parish of Acadia of that State, sustaining a plea of prescription to an action to recover land. Affirmed.

See same case below, 107 La. 522, 32 So. 243.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

This action was brought by the eighteenth judicial district court, parish of Acadia, state of Louisiana, by plaintiff in error, to have himself declared the owner of a tract of land containing 870.06 acres, described as section 41, township 7 south, range 1 east. Subsequently he amended his petition and claimed one tenth individually and nine tenths as administrator of the succession of Bennet Joplin. He traced title in both capacities to Bennet Joplin, to whom the land was confirmed by the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1807, entitled "An Act Respecting Claims of Land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana." 2 Stat. at L. 440, chap. 36. This act was an amendment to the act of March 2, 1805 (2 Stat. at L. 324, chap. 26), which provided for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the same territory. The purpose of both acts was to recognize and establish the titles possessed by the inhabitants of that territory prior to its acquisition by the United States.

Section 4 of the act of 1807 provided:

"That the commissioners appointed or to be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming land in the territories of Orleans and Louisiana shall have full powers to decide according to the laws and established usages and customs of the French and Spanish governments, upon [95] *all claims to lands within their respective districts, where the claim is made by any person or persons, or the legal representative of any person or persons, who were, on the 20th of December, one thousand eight hundred and three, inhabitants of Louisiana, and for a tract not exceeding the quantity of acres contained in a league square, and which does not include either a lead mine or salt spring, which decision of the commissioners, when in favor of the claimant, shall be final against the United States, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding."

A patent was issued July 16, 1900, in favor of Bennet Joplin, heirs and assigns. Stating the recitals of the patent and some other facts, the supreme court of Louisiana said:

"That it [the patent] was granted in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1807. It declares there had been deposited in the General Land Office of the United States a patent certificate numbered 1499, issued by the register and receiver of the United States Land Office, on the 25th of May, 1900, whereby it appeared that the private land claim of Bennet Joplin, being numbered 1927, class B, in the report of the old board of commissioners for the western district of the territory of Orleans, was confirmed by the said commissioners under the authority conferred upon them by the act of Congress approved on the 3d of March, 1807, entitled 'An Act Respecting Claims to Land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana;' that the claim had been regularly surveyed and designated as section 49 in township 7 south, of range 1 west, and section 41 in township 7 south, of range 1 east, of the Louisiana meridian, in the southwestern district of Louisiana, containing 870 acres and 6 hundredths of an acre, as appeared by a plat and descriptive notes on file (in the General Land Office) thereof, duly examined and approved by James Lewis, surveyor *general for Louisiana, on the 9th day of [96] May, 1900. That this plat and descriptive notes were inserted and made part of the patent.

"The plat and descriptive notes referred to were signed, as recited, by James Lewis, surveyor general of Louisiana, on the 9th of May, 1900.

"Immediately following the plat the surveyor general recites that it represents the survey of the private land claim of Bennet Joplin, confirmed by the old board of commissioners for the western district of Louisiana, in pursuance of the authority conferred upon them by the 4th section of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1807, entitled 'An Act Respecting Claims to Lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana,' as appeared by their confirmation certificate No. B, 1927, dated March 11, 1812. After making this recital, the surveyor general says: 'The following being a description of the survey taken from the approved field notes of N. B. Phelps, deputy surveyor.' He then gives the field notes of the survey.

"At the end of the document, under date of May 9th, 1900, are the words 'examined and approved,' followed by the signature of the surveyor general."

The defendants Chachere and Boagni depended for title upon purchases from Victor C. Sittig, by authentic acts duly recorded. Sittig purchased the same at tax sale in 1871. The defendants pleaded that Sittig and themselves had the uninterrupted, peaceable, and actual possession of the land in good faith since 1871; had erected improvements thereon and paid taxes. They also pleaded the prescription of three, four, five, ten, and twenty years. Victor Sittig was called in warranty and made the same defenses.

The district court decreed that the claim of plaintiff be rejected, the plea of prescription set up by defendants be sustained, and they be quieted in their title and possession of the land. The supreme court of the state affirmed the decree, and the case was then brought here. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel D. McEnery argued the cause, and, with Messrs. George S. Dodds and Mark M. Boatner, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

It is conceded that private land claims based on title derived from the treaty with France in the purchase of Louisiana, which had not ripened into complete grants before the cession of the territory of Louisiana, were segregated from the public domain and entered into private ownership, when the grant was confirmed by the board of commissioners, and confirmed by act of Congress, and identified by survey, and approved by the surveyor general. In such case the patent adds nothing to the title, and its issuance is a mere ministerial act.

Whitney v. Morrow, 112 U. S. 693, 28 L. ed. 871, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 333.

But in such a case the legislative confirmation must be by specific boundaries distinguishing and separating it from other tracts, and must be capable of identification.

Ibid.

The survey of 1856 was not approved until May 9, 1900, when the receiver and register approved such survey, giving to Joplin and to conflicting claimants the tracts to which they were entitled under the confirmation. It was only then that the complete legal title was vested in Joplin and his heirs to the tract of land in controversy. It was only from this time that prescription commenced.

Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. 521, 22 L. ed. 606; Morrow v. Whitney, 95 U. S. 551, 24 L. ed. 456.

Mr. Gilbert L. Dupre argued the cause, and, with Mr. E. D. Saunders, filed a brief for defendants in error:

A patent is merely evidence of a grant. It adds nothing to the grantee's rights, but only furnishes him with convenient proof thereof.

Carroll v. Safford, 3 How. 441, 11 L. ed. 671; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Prescott, 16 Wall. 192 U. S.

The allowance and confirmation by the commissioners and by Congress of a claim to a particular determined tract in itself carries title to the confirmee without survey or patent.

Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. 521, 22 L. ed. 606.

Both of the state courts found that, as a fact, a survey of the Bennet Joplin tract was made and approved by the United States surveyor general of Louisiana in 1856.

It is immaterial on what evidence the state courts based their finding of fact in this matter.

Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574, 28 L. ed. 1084, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the [100] opinion of the court:

The question presented is the effect of the defense of adverse possession and the plea of prescription. The contention of plaintiff in error is that such defense cannot avail against a United States patent. In other words, until the issue of the patent the title was in the United States, and was unaffected by the occupation of the defendants.

Counsel say:

"The confirmation to Joplin by act of Congress was only as to quantity, and not to any specifically described tract of land. There was only an equitable interest in Joplin and his heirs until a survey should be made and approved by the surveyor general, segregating his part from the public domain, and from conflicting claims. The survey of 1856 was not approved until May 9, 1900, when the receiver and register approved said survey, giving to Joplin and to conflicting claimants the tracts to which they were entitled under the confirmation. It was only then that the complete legal title was vested in Joplin and his heirs to the tract of land in controversy. It was only from this time that prescription commences.

Is the contention of counsel justified? They cite Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. 521, 22 L. ed. 606, and Morrow v. Whitney, 95 U. S. 551, 24 L. ed. 456. To determine the application of those cases there are important facts to be considered. The supreme court of Louisiana said:

"We do not think there is any dispute between the parties as to the facts. That, on the 12th of March, 1812, the board of commissioners appointed under § 4 of the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1807, confirmed to Bennet Joplin under certificate No. 1,927, by virtue of occupancy and settlement under Joseph Chevalier Poirot, 913.98 acres of land in Bayou Mallet woods, in the county of Opelousas. That on April 29, 1816 [3 Stat. at L. 329, chap. 159], Congress reciting the various acts bearing upon the subject (act of March 10, 1812 [2 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 38], act of February 27, 1813 [2 Stat. at L. 807, chap. 38], and act [101] of April, *1814 [3 Stat. at L. 121, chap. 52]) passed an act for the confirmation of certain land claims in the western district of the state of Louisiana, and that under § 1 of that act it was enacted 'that the claims marked "B," described in the reports of the commissioners for the western district of the state of Louisiana, formerly territory of Orleans, and recommended by them for confirmation, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed.' That the claim of Bennet Joplin covered by certificate No. 1,927 of the board of commissioners, was confirmed in favor of Joplin by that act of Congress. That although the claim was so confirmed by act of Congress, no patent was issued for the land by the United States government until July, 1900."

In other words, the land claimed by Poirot was identified by his possession. It contained a definite quantity. Fractions of acres were even regarded, and almost necessarily. The right of a claimant depended upon possession, and naturally its extent was marked by definite boundaries. How else could a claim have any strength at all, —any right to confirmation at all? The certificates issued by the commissioners were denominated grants (§7), and they were required to designate a tract of land (§6). Section 7, it is true, provided for a survey. The provision is "that the tracts of land thus granted by the commissioners shall be surveyed at the expense of the parties, under the direction of the surveyor general," in all cases where authenticated plats of the land, as surveyed by the French, Spanish, and American governments, respectively, shall not have been filed with the proper register and recorder, or shall not appear on the public records of the territories. The surveying officer was required to transmit general and particular plats of land thus surveyed to the proper register and recorder, and copies to the Secretary of the Treasury. The duties of the officers under the act may be summarized as follows: (1) The commissioners to investigate the claim, and, if they confirmed it, to issue a certificate thereof, and transmit a transcript of their final decision to the Secretary of the Treasury. (2) The register and receiver, upon the filing of the *certifi-[102] cate with him and a plat of the land being also filed with him by the surveyor general or officer acting as surveyor general, should issue a certificate, which, being transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, would entitle the party to a patent. (3) The survey of the land by the surveyor general or officer acting as such. (4) Reports by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress "for their final determination hereon, in the manner and at the time heretofore prescribed by law for that purpose." There is no evidence that the register and receiver issued a certificate other than that mentioned in the patent. The commissioners performed the duties required of them and the Secretary of the Treasury performed his. And a survey was made of the land in 1856.

Under these facts did the title pass by the confirmation expressed in the act of Congress of April 29, 1816 (3 Stat. at L. 328, chap. 159), or, at the latest, upon the survey in 1856, or did it pass by the patent in July, 1900? For answer we may refer to the cases cited by the plaintiff in error.

In Langdcau v. Hanes, the contest was between a title claimed by virtue of the act of Congress, March 26, 1804 [2 Stat. at L. 277, chap. 35], which confirmed claims to lands in the district of Vincennes, and a title claimed by adverse possession. It was provided by the act of Congress that a person to whom land is confirmed, whenever his claim shall have been located and surveyed, shall be entitled to the certificate from the register and receiver, which certificate shall entitle him to a patent. The tract in dispute was surveyed in 1820, but a patent was not issued until 1872. The defendant's claim of title rested on an adverse possession of thirty years. The state court held that the act of confirmation of 1807 was a present grant, and became so far operative and complete as to convey the legal title when the land was located and surveyed by the United States in 1820; second, the patent was not of itself a grant of the land, but only evidence of a grant; third, the adverse possession of the defendant was a bar to the recovery by the plaintiff. These propositions were affirmed by this court. The *court held that the act of Congress of 1804 [103] was a recognition and discharge of the obligation incurred by the government upon acquiring the territory from Virginia, to protect and confirm the possession and titles of the inhabitants to their property. And it was held that it was competent for Congress to provide how that it should be done, and Congress required a presentation of the claims to the register and receiver of the Land Office, constituted them commissioners to pass upon the claims "according to justice and equity," and to transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury a transcript of their decisions with his report. The Secretary of the Treasury submitted the decisions and the report to Congress, as he has required to do, and Congress passed the act of 1807 to confirm them. The court said:

"This confirmation was the fulfillment of the condition stipulated in the deed of cession so far as the claimants were concerned. It was an authoritative recognition by record of the ancient possession and title of their ancestor, and gave to them such assurance of the validity of that possession and title as would be always respected by the courts of the country. The subsequent clause of the act providing for the issue of a patent to the claimants when their claim was located and surveyed took nothing from the force of the confirmation.

"In the legislation of Congress a patent has a double operation. It is a conveyance by the government when the government has any interest to convey, but where it is issued upon the confirmation of a claim of a previously existing title it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record, of the existence of that title, or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation. The instrument is not the less efficacious as evidence of previously existing rights because it also embodies words of release or transfer from the government.

[104] "In the present case the patent would have been of great value to the claimants as record evidence of the ancient possession and title of their ancestor, and of the recognition and confirmation *by the United States, and would have obviated in any controversies at law respecting the land the necessity of other proof, and would thus have been to them an instrument of quiet and security. But it would have added nothing to the force of the confirmation. The survey required for the patent was only to secure certainty of description in the instrument, and to inform the government of the quantity reserved to private parties from the domain ceded by Virginia.

"The whole error of the plaintiff arises from his theory that the fee to the land in controversy passed to the United States by the cession from Virginia, and that a patent was essential to its transfer to the claimants, whereas, with respect to the lands covered by the possession of the inhabitants and settlers mentioned in the deed of cession, the fee never passed to the United States, and if it had passed, and a mere equitable title had remained in the claimants after the cession, the confirmation by the act of 1807 would have operated as a release to them of the interest of the United States. A legislative confirmation of a claim to land is a recognition of the validity of such claim, and operates as effectually as a grant or quitclaim from the government."

This doctrine was repeated in Morrow v. Whitney, 95 U. S. 551, 24 L. ed. 456. The question arose upon the ruling of the trial court refusing to admit a patent of the United States in evidence. Sustaining the ruling, this court said:

"In this case, the patent would have been of great value to the claimant. It would have enabled him, without other proof, to maintain his title in the tribunals of the country. Founded as it would have been upon a survey by the government, it would have removed the doubt as to the boundaries of the tract, which always arises where their establishment rests in the uncertain recollection of witnesses as to ancient possession. It would thus have proved to its possessor an instrument of quiet and security, but it would not have added anything to the interest vested by the confirmation. Ryan v. Carter, 93 U. S. 78, 23 L. ed. 807."

*These cases are not in conflict with Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. 93, 20 L. ed. 534, as was observed in Langdeau v. Hanes. The land in controversy had been part of the public lands of the United States. The title of Gibson was derived under the act of Congress of February 17, 1815, for the relief of the inhabitants of the county of New Madrid, in the territory of Missouri, who had suffered by earthquakes. 3 Stat. at L. 211, chap. 45. James T. O'Carroll obtained permission from the Spanish authorities to settle on vacant lands in the district of New Madrid, in the territory of Louisiana, and in pursuance of the permission he settled upon a tract embracing about 1,000 arpents of land, in that part of the country which afterwards comprised the county of New Madrid in the territory of Missouri. The land settled upon, to the extent of 640 acres, was confirmed to O'Carroll by different acts of Congress. In 1812 the land was injured by an earthquake, and, upon proof of the fact, the recorder of land titles at St. Louis gave a certificate to that effect, which authorized the location of a like quantity on any of the public lands of the territory of Missouri, a sale of which was authorized by law. Under this certificate the land in dispute was located. The land located had been previously surveyed, but for some cause the survey and plat were not returned to the recorder until August, 1841. The recorder then issued a patent certificate to "James T. O'Carroll or his legal representatives." The survey was not approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, because it did not show its interferences with conflicting claimants. A new survey and plat were made, showing interferences, and were filed with the recorder on the 26th of March, 1862, and a new patent certificate issued. In the following June the patent of the United States was issued to Mary McRee, who had acquired the interest of the locator by various mesne conveyances. In August following she conveyed to Gibson. Against the title thus acquired, among other defenses, adverse possession for the period prescribed by the statute of Missouri was pleaded. The plea was sustained. The judgment was reversed by this court.

[105] *It is obvious that there is a clear distinction between the case and Langdeau v. Hanes and Morrow v. Whitney. The act of 1815 did not confirm to O'Carroll the tract of land which he obtained from the Spanish authorities. It only enabled him or his representatives to locate a like quantity of the public land, and a segregation of that quantity and its exact identification were necessary, and this did not occur until the issue of the patent in 1862. The patent, therefore, was not the mere formal assurance of a title that had been conveyed by another government, but it was the conveyance of the title of this government after conditions performed, which authorized but did not anticipate it, nor were they its equivalent. The case at bar, therefore, does not come under the precedent of Gibson v. Chouteau; it comes under that of Langdeau v. Hanes and Morrow v. Whitney.

Plaintiff in error claims under Joplin, who claimed under Poiret, who claimed under the French government. And it was the title to a tract of land thus claimed that the commissioners under the act of 1807 adjudicated and granted, and it was that title which was confirmed by the act of April 29, 1816.

What element, then, is wanting? Plaintiff in error says the identification of the land,—its complete definition by boundaries,—and until this was done the title was in the United States. We need not dispute the principle upon which the contention rests. We think its conditions were satisfied. Poiret's title was obtained by occupation, and the right of his successor, Joplin, depended upon that, and by that the award of the commissioners could only have been measured. It is not conceivable that the boundaries of the tract were not ascertained by them. Their certificate, as was seen, expressed an exact quantity, 918.98 acres, and having a frontage of 1,080 arpents. The evidence before the commissioners is not exhibited, but there was a survey in 1856. The remarks of the supreme court of Louisiana are, therefore, apposite:

"It is evident that Poiret was shown to the board to have already occupied and settled a particular body of land for the time *stated, and to have already had an existing[107] right or privilege to a particular tract. The identity of the tract confirmed must have been fixed by evidence before the board, and the survey which followed was unquestionably based upon that evidence, preserved and made known to the surveyor. The Joplin claim under Poiret was not based upon the survey, but the survey was based upon the existing claim, and simply identified the land to which Poiret and Joplin were entitled by antecedent occupancy and settlement."

Speaking of the survey, the court said:

"If, however, a survey of the claim was necessary in order to complete the transfer of ownership of this property to Joplin, we are satisfied that a survey of the same was made and approved by the surveyor general, W. J. McCulloh, as far back as 1856. The present surveyor general of Louisiana refers to the survey and field notes of Phelps as having been approved, but not as a matter of original approval by himself, as the plaintiff seems to contend. In the act of sale of this land under which the plaintiff claims from James W. Joplin to James H. Houston, Jr., the land transferred is referred to as a 'Spanish grant' with the added words (see parish map and a list of private land claims, where the above described property is well defined as belonging to Bennet Joplin). We have before us a copy of the parish map here referred to, with the different private claims (among others that of Bennet Joplin) distinctly set out, and the surveys on which they were located minutely detailed, certified to as far back as 1856 by the surveyor general. It may be that it is not strictly and technically in evidence, but it is before us by reference in one of the acts, and were we not to act upon it the only effect would be to remand uselessly the case in order to have it formally introduced."

Bennet Joplin, it was testified, died before the assessment was made upon which the tax sale upon which the title of the defendants in error depended, and the validity of the assessment, therefore, is denied, because it was not made in the name of the owner, as required by the statute of the state of 1870. *The assessment is also at-[108] tacked for nonconformity with the statutes in other particulars. In passing on the questions thus raised the supreme court of Louisiana construed the statutes of the state differently from plaintiff in error, and answered all the questions on grounds not Federal, and which, therefore, we need not discuss.

Judgment affirmed.

Constitutional law—validity of police regulations excluding females from saloons.

A municipal ordinance which prohibits liquor sellers from providing wine rooms or other places where females may be supplied with liquor, and from permitting females to be or remain for that purpose where liquor is sold or in any place adjacent thereto or connected therewith, and from employing females to wait or attend upon any person therein, and which forbids females from remaining in any such place and waiting and attending upon any person, or soliciting drinks therein,—is a valid exercise of the police power, not repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

Decided January 4, 1904.*

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado to review a judgment NOTE.—Validity of police regulations excluding women from saloons.

Police regulations, whether designed entirely to exclude women from saloons or to prohibit their presence there for certain purposes, have quite generally been sustained.

Where the regulations merely prohibit the sale of liquor where women are employed they have been held to be valid. State ex rel. Marion v. Reynolds, 14 Mont. 383, 36 Pac. 449; Ex parte Hayes, 98 Cal. 555, 20 L. R. A. 701, 33 Pac. 337.

And there can be no objection to the validity of an ordinance which fixes the amount of a saloon license at a higher rate where women are employed. Ex parte Felchliu, 96 Cal. 360, 31 Pac. 224.

An ordinance which forbids granting a liquor license to any person employing women to wait on customers in carrying on the liquor business is also valid. Poster v. Police Comrs. 102 Cal. 483, 37 Pac. 763.

Regulations which absolutely prohibit the employment of women in places where intoxicating liquors are sold have, with one exception, been sustained. Bergman v. Cleveland, 39 Ohio St. 651; State v. Considine, 16 Wash. 358, 47 Pac. 755; Re Considine, 83 Fed. 157; Hoboken v. Goodman, 68 N. J. L. 217, 51 Atl. 1092. Contra, Re Maguire, 57 Cal. 604, 40 Am. Rep. 125, where an ordinance making it a misdemeanor for a female to wait, or in any manner attend, upon any person in any place where liquors are used or sold, was held to be repugnant to Cal. Const. art. 20, § 18, providing that "no person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon, or pursuing, any lawful business, vocation, or profession."

And the fact that an ordinance of this charwhich reversed a decree of the District Court of Arapahoe County perpetually enjoining municipal officials from enforcing an ordinance excluding females from saloons. Affirmed.

See same case below, 29 Colo. 488, 69 Pac. 590.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Milton Smith submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The statutory provision guaranteeing civil rights, and entitling all persons to the full and equal enjoyment of all places of public resort and amusement, is clearly violated by the enforcement of this ordinance.

Baylies v. Curry, 128 Ill. 287, 21 N. E. 595; Washington, A. & G. R. Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445, 21 L. ed. 675; New Orleans v. Philippi, 9 La. Ann. 44; Siloam Springs v. Thompson, 41 Ark. 461; Haywood v. Savannah, 12 Ga. 405.

That a particular use of property is declared a nuisance by an ordinance of the city does not make that use of property a nuisance unless it is in fact so, and comes within the common-law or statutory idea of nuisance.

Wood, Nuisances, p. 977.

Ordinances on the subject of the sale of acter permits the wife of a licensed proprietor to sell or distribute drinks, and that women are not debarred from proprietorship under license, does not make the ordinance invalid as a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Hoboken v. Goodman, 68 N. J. L. 217, 51 Atl. 1092.

It is also a fair police regulation to prohibit a saloon keeper from permitting women to assemble in his saloon for the purpose of enticing customers. Hoboken v. Greiner, 68 N. J. L. 592, 53 Atl. 693.

And a statute making it unlawful to sell liquors where women are allowed to assemble for the purposes of the business there carried on was held valid in State ex rel. Marion v. Reynolds, 14 Mont. 383, 36 Pac. 449.

A state may even absolutely prohibit any woman from remaining in a saloon after 12 o'clock at night,—so far, at least, as the constitutional requirement that every law of a general nature shall have a uniform operation is concerned. Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 702.

And women may be prohibited from entering or remaining in a wine room connected with a saloon for the purpose of being supplied with liquor. Adams v. Cronin, 29 Colo. 488, 69 Pac. 590.

But a municipal ordinance making it a misdemeanor for a woman to go into any building where liquor is sold, or stand within 50 feet of such building, is void as an unnecessary interference with individual liberty. Gastineau v. Com. 108 Ky. 473, 49 L. R. A. 111, 56 S. W. 705.

And see the note appended to the report of the case last cited, in 49 L. R. A. 111, on the question of the constitutionality of discrimination against women in police regulations.

spirituous and other intoxicating liquors must be in conformity to the general laws of the state, and cannot be such as are repugnant to, and violative of, the Constitution of the state or of the United States; nor can they be such as are utterly opposed to, and nullify, existing statutory laws; and authority to enact ordinances on that subject cannot be construed as imparting to the municipality the power to repeal the general laws in force.

Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 315, 316.

This ordinance is a special and unwarranted discrimination against a large class of citizens.

Memphis v. Winfield, 8 Humph. 707; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 322.

The ordinance is not void solely because it is unjust, partial, and oppressive, and because it violates natural, social, and political rights of our citizens; but because it prohibits rights and privileges, and takes away property rights guaranteed and protected by the Constitution and laws of the state and of the nation,—not only such rights as rest merely upon the Constitution, but upon the great principles of eternal justice which lie at the foundation of all free governments.

A woman has the same rights as a man.

Re Maguire, 57 Cal. 604, 40 Am. Rep. 125.

The restrictions of these ordinances are invalid because they do not operate equally upon all persons, and because they tend to deprive certain persons of the right to do business and acquire property.

Mr. Charles R. Brock argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Henry A. Lindsley and Halsted L. Ritter, filed a brief for defendants in error:

To the states has been reserved the right to regulate and control within their respective boundaries and in their own discretion every trade or business which affects the public health, public safety, or public morals.

A statute which limits the period which workmen shall be required to labor each day in mines or in smelters for the reduction or refining of ores or metals to eight hours per day is held in Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, to be a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state.

L'Heute v. New Orleans, 177 U. S. 588, 44 L. ed. 899, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788, holds an ordinance to be valid within the police power of the state which seeks to regulate the location, within certain limits of the city, of houses occupied by women of lewd character.

Whatever is contrary to the public policy, or inimical to the public interests, is subject to the police power of the state, and within legislative control; and, in the exercise of such power, the legislature is vested with a large discretion, which, if exercised bona fide, for the protection of the public, is beyond the reach of judicial inquiry.

The police power is not subject to any definite limitations, but is coextensive with the necessities of the ease and the safeguard of the public interests.

Campfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. ed. 260, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864.

It is upon the principle advanced in the cases mentioned that it is held that the states may control and regulate the sale of ardent spirits within their respective boundaries.

S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13.

From the principle announced in the above authorities it follows that no citizen has an inherent or indefeasible right, either to buy, or to sell, intoxicating liquors.

The right to prohibit the sale to all necessarily includes the right to prohibit the sale to some. It is a matter wholly within the discretion of the state and the city. The state, in its own wisdom, may wipe the traffic out entirely by prohibiting the sale to all, or it may lessen the evil by designating those most likely to be injured by its use and prohibiting its sale to them.

There has been no unlawful exercise of power reserved to the state of Colorado in the enactment of the laws before the court.

192 U. S.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendants in error, who were officers of the city of Denver, to restrain them from enforcing an ordinance of the city on the ground that the ordinance was "contrary to the provision of the Constitution of the state of Colorado and amendments thereto, and contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States," and "contrary to the laws of the state of Colorado, guaranteeing civil rights to all persons, and contrary to other statutes of the state of Colorado."

A preliminary injunction was allowed. It was made perpetual upon hearing, by decree of the court. The decree was reversed by the supreme court of the state, and this writ of error was then sued out.

*Sections 745 and 746 of article 15 of the [113] ordinance of Denver, which are complained of and attacked, are as follows:

"Sec. 745. Each and every liquor saloon, dram shop, or tippling house keeper, . . . who shall have or keep, in connection with or as part of such liquor saloon, dram shop, or tippling house, any wine room or other place, either with or without door or doors, curtain or curtains, or screen of any kind, into which any female person shall be permitted to enter from the outside, or from such liquor saloon, dram shop, or tippling house, and there be supplied with any kind of liquor whatsoever, shall, upon conviction, be fined as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 746. No person . . . having charge or control of any liquor saloon or place where intoxicating or malt liquors are sold or given away, or any place adjacent thereto, or connected therewith in any manner whatsoever, either by doors or otherwise, shall suffer or permit any female person to be or remain in such liquor saloon, dram shop, tippling house, or other place where intoxicating or malt liquors are sold or given away, for the purpose of there being supplied with any kind of liquor whatsoever. No person owning or having charge or control of any liquor saloon, dram shop, or tippling house shall employ or procure, or cause to be employed or procured, any female person to wait or in any manner attend on any person in any dram shop, tippling house, or liquor saloon, or in any place adjacent thereto or connected therewith where intoxicating or malt liquors are sold or given away, nor shall any female person be or remain in any dram shop, tippling house, liquor saloon, or place adjacent thereto or connected therewith, and wait or attend on any person, or solicit drinks in any such place."

The supreme court held that those sections did not violate the Constitution of the state, and that they were authorized by the statutes of the state, and sustained the validity of the ordinance against the contention that it violated the Constitution of the United States, on the ground that it was enacted *in the exercise of the police power of the state. Declaring the laws of the state in regard to liquor selling, the court said:

"Under the license laws of this state no one may engage in the business of selling liquor without a license. He has no absolute right to sell at all. It is only a privilege he gets when a license is granted. The city of Denver, under its charter, has the exclusive power to prohibit, restrain, tax, and regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors. It may exercise that power to prohibit the sale altogether; or, if it sees fit, it may regulate the sale and impose such conditions as it deems necessary. Under these license laws, one may not engage in the liquor traffic as of common right, but may do so only upon compliance with prescribed regulations, and if he applies for a license under which only he may lawfully sell, he is held to take that license with whatever restrictions or limitations are imposed by the authority which, and which only, can give him the coveted privilege. One of the conditions which the charter of Denver requires to be inserted in every liquor license is the one of which plaintiff complains." [29 Colo. 495, 69 Pac. 592.]

This, the court decided, disposed of the complaint of plaintiff in error. In other words, that the restrictions of the ordinance were conditions of his license, and by accepting the license he accepted the conditions, and no rights of his were infringed. "The traffic in it (liquor) is unlawful without a license, and it may be prohibited in Denver," was the unequivocal declaration of the court.

What cause of action, then, has plaintiff in error? He is not a female nor delegated to champion any grievance females may have under the ordinance, if they have any. The right to sell liquor by retail to anybody depends upon the laws of the state, and they have affixed to that right the condition expressed in the ordinance. But even if plaintiff in error were not in such situation he cannot resist the ordinance. We said in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13:

"The sale of such liquors in this way [by retail] has therefore been, at all times, by the courts of every state, considered *as the proper subject of legislative regulation. Not only may a license be exacted from the keeper of the saloon before a glass of his liquors can be thus disposed of, but restrictions may be imposed as to the class of persons to whom they may be sold, and the hours of the day and the days of the week on which the saloons may be opened. Their sale in that form may be absolutely prohibited. It is a question of public expediency and public morality, and not of Federal law. The police power of the state is fully competent to regulate the business,—to mitigate its evils or to suppress it entirely. There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquors by retail; it is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or of a citizen of the United States."

Judgment affirmed.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the County Court of Arapahoe County, affirming a conviction in the Police Court of the city of Denver for the violation of a municipal ordinance excluding females from saloons. Affirmed.

See same case below, 29 Colo. 503, 69 Pac. 1125.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Milton Smith submitted the cause for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles R. Brock argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Henry A. Lindsley and Hulsted L. Ritter, filed a brief for defendant in error.

For contentions of counsel see their briefs as reported in Cronin v. Adams, ante, 365.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the police court of the city of *Denver, state of Colo-[116] rado, to collect $500, for the violation of § 746 of ordinance No. 101 of the city. Plaintiff in error was found guilty, and fined the sum of $50. On appeal to the county court he was also found guilty, and fined $100. The judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of the state, and thereupon the chief justice of the state allowed this writ of error.

The case involves the constitutionality of §§ 745 and 746 of the ordinance of the city of Denver. That question was passed upon in Cronin v. Adams, 192 U. S. 108, ante, 365, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 219, just decided, and on its authority the judgment is affirmed.

3. The restoration of the assets of a decedent's estate to the hands of the administrator, with the duty of distribution, which was effected by an order made on condition of his filing a new bond, did not relieve him from his obligation assumed under a prior order, made by consent of all parties, which directed that the assets should remain under the control of the court, and that he should act as administrator without any allowance for commission or other charge for his services as such.
4. Charging the sums paid to the legatees on a partial distribution of a decedent's estate against their legacies instead of against their share in the residuary estate is not objectionable as stopping the running of interest on the legacies to the disadvantage of such legatees, because the sum paid on such distribution to one entitled to share only in such residuary estate necessarily is charged against his share thereof.

5. Counsel fees paid from a decedent's estate upon a petition of legatees which stated that counsel had been managing their interests are properly directed to be borne by such legatees, where they consented to the order directing the same to be charged to their distributive shares, without reserving any right to apply to have it finally charged to the estate.
6. An administrator is properly charged with interest on a sum which stands on the record charged to him with his consent as money which he should have put into his account and held as an identified fund.
7. Interest is properly charged against an administrator on a sum which he retained in his own hands after the assets of the decedent's estate had been ordered paid into court, and then had been transferred to the solicitors of the parties as custodians, by an order made with the consent of the parties.

Argued December 8, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

A PPEALS from, and IN ERROR to, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a decree which affirmed a final decree of the Supreme Court of the District, settling the account of an administrator with the will annexed. Affirmed.

See same case below, 20 App. D. C. 134.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William G. Johnson argued the cause and filed a brief for Charles McIntire:

No other rational explanation can be furnished than that it was the intention of the testator, by his special pecuniary bequest to the children of Edwin, to place that set of children upon what he conceived to be an equality with his brother Charles, and, having thus equalized the situation, to divide the remainder of his estate into two parts between the children of his two brothers.

White v. Holland, 92 Ga. 216, 18 S. E. 17.

The word "between," without something to qualify its ordinary meaning, must be taken in its proper sense as indicating a division between two, and not among six.

Thrie's Estate, 162 Pa. 369, 29 Atl. 750; Green's Estate, 140 Pa. 253, 21 Atl. 317; Records v. Fields, 155 Mo. 314, 55 S. W. 1021.

Had the testator in this case intended the residue to go to all his nephews and nieces in equal shares per capita, it would have been very simple and natural to have bequeathed the residue to his nieces and nephews or to the children of his brothers, without specifying how it was to be divided. They would have taken per capita.

The old technical rule of construction is no longer of force.

Messrs. Charles Cowles Tucker and William Henry Dennis argued the cause, and, with Mr. Henry E. Davis, filed a brief for Edward A. McIntire et al.:

The fact that Charles, Sr., the brother of the testator, was living when the will was made, lends a significance to the words of the will, and throws a light upon the intent of the testator which renders an interpretation of the language of the will a matter of little or no difficulty.

The English rule of construction, that, where a gift is to the children of several persons, whether it be to the children of A and B, or to the children of A and the children of B, they take per capita, and not per stirpes,—is supported by the weight of American construction.

While it may be conceded that decisions of the Maryland courts, rendered since the cession of the District by that state, are not in general binding on the courts of the District of Columbia, it is suggested that such decisions are always very persuasive, and should be followed unless manifestly wrong. This is especially true where rules of property, or rules for the effect and construction of wills, are involved. And in some instances they are to be regarded as binding in our courts.

The allowance of commissions is a matter peculiarly within the province of the orphans' court, which has a close-at-hand view of the administration of the estate; and, so far as discretion is vested in that court, its exercise is not subject to appeal.

In Eversfield v. Eversfield, 4 Harr. & J. 12, even where an executrix had agreed to charge no commission and the orphans' court had acted upon that agreement, yet, when she afterward applied for her commission, it was held that the court should grant it.

So, where one executor claimed to have done all the work pertaining to his position, he was, nevertheless, directed to share his commission with his coexecutors.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

These are cross appeals from the court of appeals of the District of Columbia. See 14 App. D. C. 337. To avoid all questions of form there are also writs of error on the same grounds. The appeal of Charles McIntire is from the overruling of exceptions to the final account of the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of David [120] McIntire, and presents two *questions, one of construction and one of administration, outside the terms of the will. The probate of the will already has been before this court. 162 U. S. 383, 40 L. ed. 1009, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 814.

The question of construction is the main one. It is whether the children of the testator's brothers, Edwin and Charles, take per capita or per stirpes under the residuary clause of the following will:

January 7th, 1880.

This is my last will and testament.

I David McIntire, tin-plate worker, of this city (of) do will, bequeath, or devise, to my nephews, and nieces, that is to say, from July the first. 1st eighteen hundred and fifty-four. 1854.

To the opening of. on reading of this, paper. one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars and sixty-four cents ($1,350.64) is to be calculated at six (6) per cent. interest

That amount whatever it may be is to be given to each of my brother Edwin's children. The remainder if any, is to be equally divided between my Brothers Edwin and Charles children. David McIntire.

192 U. S.

There was an addition and also an earlier document of January 1, 1880, which it is unnecessary to copy. At the date of the will the brother Charles was living and had two sons, Charles and Henry, the latter of whom died before the testator. The brother Edwin had died, leaving six children, one of whom died before the testator. The testator held promissory notes of his brother Charles for $1,350.63. The brother Charles also now is dead.

The argument for a division per stirpes is this. Earlier in the paper the testator had used the phrase "nephews and nieces," which it would have been natural to repeat had he intended to make a division per capita. But instead of that he says "my brothers Edwin and Charles children," which is not very different from "my brother Edwin's children and my brother Charles's children," and orders an equal division "between" them. "Between," if accurately used, imports that not more *than two persons or groups are [121] set against each other (Ihrle's Estate, 162 Pa. 369, 372, 29 Atl. 750; Records v. Fields, 155 Mo. 314, 322, 55 S. W. 1021), and those groups are earmarked and shown to be regarded as groups by naming the parents from which respectively they come. The equality of division is an equality between the groups. See Hall v. Hall, 140 Mass. 267, 271, 2 N. E. 700. This mode of distribution has the recommendation that it follows the rule in cases of intestacy. Raymond v. Hillhouse, 45 Conn. 467, 474, 29 Am. Rep. 688. See, further, Alder v. Beale, 11 Gill & J. 123, explained in Plummer v. Shepherd, 94 Md. 466, 470, 51 Atl. 173. But the court is of opinion that the general rule of construction must prevail, according to which, in the case of a gift to the children of several persons described as standing in a certain relation to the testator, the objects of the gift take per capita, and not per stirpes. Walker v. Griffin, 11 Wheat. 375, 379, 6 L. ed. 498, 499; Balcom v. Haynes, 14 Allen, 204; Hill v. Bowers, 120 Mass. 135. The fact that one of the parents was living at the date of the will is deemed sufficient to exclude a reference to the statute of distributions. Blackler v. Webb, 2 P. Wms. 383; Bryant v. Scott, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 155, 157, 28 Am. Dec. 590. And with regard to the word "between," the will is an illiterate will, and as the popular use of the word is not accurate no conclusion safely can be based upon that. See Maddox v. State, 4 Harr. & J. 539; Brittain v. Carson, 46 Md. 186; Lord v. Moore, 20 Conn. 122; Pitney v. Brown, 44 Ill. 363; Farmer v. Kimball, 40 N. H. 435, 439, 88 Am. Dec. 219; Burnet v. Burnet, 30 N. J. Eq. 595; Myres v. Myres, 23 How. Pr. 410; Waller v. Forsythe, 62 N. C. (1 Phill. Eq.) 353.

The other error assigned on behalf of Charles McIntire is that the court charged the estate with $11,500, fees paid to counsel for services in defending the will against the attack of the said Charles and his father. The amount was paid in different sums by orders of court, in several instances on the petition of the children of Edwin, one of whom was the administrator with the will annexed, and was directed to be charged [122] *against the interest of those children in the first instance, but without prejudice to an application to have it finally charged against the estate. On the allowance of the account it was charged against the estate. We are of opinion that the charge was proper. There is no contest over the amount. It was the proper business and duty of the administrator to defend the will, and he was entitled to a reasonable allowance for what he had to pay in doing so. The only just alternative would be to charge counsel fees as costs against the losing party, which would have been less favorable to the appellant. The general proposition is not disputed, but it is said that in this case the legatees retained the counsel and therefore ought to pay them. The other legatees as well as the administrator no doubt had a share in calling the counsel in. But that did not matter. The services were services to the estate in maintaining the testator's will; they were adopted by the administrator, and the usual rule must prevail. It is said that there was no application to change the original order, and no chance to be heard against it. But plainly this cannot be true. As observed by the court below, allowing the account changed the order and charged the fees on the estate. Whatever want of formality there may have been, the appellant had the right and opportunity to object and except to the account, as well on this ground as others, and he used it. The precise mode in which the allowance appeared upon the account is not material, but may be explained in a word or two. The payments were made by the solicitors of the parties while they had the assets in their hands, as will be stated in a moment. They rendered their account, crediting themselves with those payments generally. Then they turned over the assets, less these payments and their commissions, to the administrator. In the account of the latter he charges himself only with the net amount received by him, and makes no charge for the counsel fees against the legatees, and thus throws the burden on the residue of the estate.

The foregoing considerations dispose of the appeal of Charles *McIntire. There is a [123] cross appeal by the administrator from the allowance of certain exceptions to the account. The first error assigned is that he was denied commissions. The reason was this. On February 19, 1885, pending the controversy on the will and other controversies, an order was made by consent of all parties, to the effect, among other things, that Edwin A. McIntire should act as administrator, "but without any allowance for commission or other charge for his services as such administrator," and that the assets should remain under the control of the court (they having been paid into court under another order of the same date, passed in an equity cause). The next year, all debts having been paid except a disputed note, another order was made by consent, turning over the assets to the solicitors of the parties. The funds were managed by the solicitors until the will was established, when, on petition of the administrator, offering to give an additional bond, the assets were put into his hands on July 7, 1896, upon his filing a bond for $100,000. It is argued that this restoration of the assets to the hands of the administrator, with the duty of distribution and the requirement of a new bond, relieved him of the terms of the bargain on which it was agreed that he should act, if that bargain ever was valid. We think it enough to say that we perceive no such change of situation from what was anticipated as should have that result. Whether the bargain was good or bad, the services were rendered under it, and therefore purported to be gratuitous. The law does not forbid gratuitous services, even in fiduciary relations, and if acts purport to be done gratuitously no claim for payment can be founded upon them at a later date. See Johnson v. Kimball, 172 Mass. 398, 400, 401, 52 N. E. 386.

A partial distribution was made under an order of December 9, 1897, of $2,800 to each of the children of Edwin, and of $6,022.02 to Charles McIntire. Complaint is made because the sums paid to Edwin's children were charged against the legacies to them instead of against their share in the residue, whereas the payment to Charles was charged to his share in *the residue, which [124] was all he had. It is said that this mode stops the running of interest on the legacies, to the disadvantage of the legatees. But we see no ground for complaint. Of course, the liabilities of the estate in the form of legacies as well as those in the form of debts are to be satisfied before the residue exists. In the absence of a definite understanding at the time, partial payments naturally would be taken as working that satisfaction and as stopping the liability of the estate for interest. The same principle applies to another sum which four of the legatees agreed to treat as having been paid to them as stated below.

A third error alleged concerns $500, part of the counsel fees in addition to the sums mentioned above. This was paid upon a petition of Edwin's children, stating that the counsel "had been managing their interests," and under an order directing the same to be charged to their distributive shares, without reserving any right to apply to have it finally charged to the estate. We are not disposed to overturn the decision that this payment must be borne by the legatees, as they were content to be charged with it in the order allowing the payment.

The next error assigned is that the administrator was charged with interest on an item of $10,000 from April 18, 1884, to February 25, 1885. This sum was alleged to have been received by the administrator, and improperly omitted from the inventory. The matter was referred to arbitrators. In order to avoid a family quarrel, if possible, the four sisters of the administrator agreed to be charged with $2,500 each, as on a partial distribution, and gave receipts on February 25, 1885. Thereupon the administrator requested the arbitrators to find that he received and must account for the sum, and they did so. Very probably the matter of interest was overlooked, but the result of the transaction is that the administrator stands charged on the record as owing the estate $10,000 until the time of distribution to the sisters, and of course that he must pay interest at the legal rate. It is not a case of charging interest not earned against [125] an administrator having funds in his *hands as such, but it is a charge against him for money which he ought to have put into his account and held as an identified fund, but did not. The motives which induced his consent to charge himself are immaterial. Whatever they were, the effect of the record is the same.

Finally, the administrator objects to being charged with interest on an item of $1,419.72, which he received in 1891. There is, perhaps, more doubt about this than concerning the more important matters, but we shall not disturb the decree. The assets had been ordered to be paid into court and then had been transferred, as above stated, to the solicitors of the parties as custodians. The administrator did not pay this sum over, but kept it in his own hands.

Decree affirmed.

v.

DORA MAY DORMITZER, William L. Tull, and Ernest B. Tull.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 125-129.)

Constitutional law—full faith and credit—foreign decree of divorce—contradiction of jurisdictional facts.

A decree of divorce may be impeached collaterally in the courts of another state by proof that the court granting it had no jurisdiction because of the plaintiff's want of domicile, even when the record purports to show such jurisdiction and the appearance of the other party.

Argued December 16, 17, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Washington to review a judgment which reversed a judgment of the Superior Court of the County of Spokane in that State, dismissing a suit to establish a right to an undivided share in certain real property upon the theory that it was community property of the parents of the plaintiffs. Affirmed.

See same case below, 23 Wash. 132, 62 Pac. 862.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Scott Goodfellow argued the cause, and, with Messrs. E. C. Hughes and W. W. Hindman, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The mere setting up of a judgment of a court of a sister state, and asking that effect be given to it, introduce a Federal question.

There was no issue of fact whatsoever, tendered either to the superior court or to the supreme court in impeachment of the Kansas divorce, excepting, only, the existence of the record; if, therefore, the supreme-court decision be treated as a finding of fact as to domicil, residence, fraud, service of summons, or authority of the attorney to appear, such finding was without the issue.

As between Tull and his wife, this was not a foreign judgment, but a domestic judgment. The mere fact that she was without the territorial limits of the state at the time of service of summons, even if she did not afterwards appear by attorney, makes no difference.

Messrs. William M. Murray and Frederick W. Dewart filed a brief for Ernest B. Tull:

There are certain Federal questions which need not be raised in the lower court, but this is not one of them.

Columbia Water Power Co. v. Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co. 172 U. S. 475, 43 L. ed. 521, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247.

Jurisdiction cannot arise in such case from inference, but only from averments so distinct and positive as to place it beyond question that the party bringing the case up intended to assert a Federal right.

F. G. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648, 41 L. ed. 1149, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 709; Kipley v. Illinois, 170 U. S. 182, 42 L. ed. 998, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550; Chapin v. Fye, 179 U. A point that was never raised cannot be said to have been decided adversely to a party who never set it up or in any way alluded to it.

Dewey v. Des Moines, 173 U. S. 193, 43 L. ed. 665, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379.

Whether the Federal claim was properly and sufficiently set up is a question for this court, and any statement by the court below, or by any of its members, does not bind this court.

Erie R. Co. v. Purdy, 185 U. S. 148, 46 L. ed. 847, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 605.

And it has been held that a certificate by the chief justice of the supreme court of the state is insufficient to give this court jurisdiction, but that such a certificate may be used to make certain and specific what is too general and indefinite in the record.

Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Adams, 180 U. S. 41, 45 L. ed. 415, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 256.

Statements from the briefs filed in the supreme court of the state were not proper to show that the Federal question was raised in the lower court.

Zadig v. Baldwin, 166 U. S. 485, 41 L. ed. 1087, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 639.

But, assuming, without intimating an opinion to that effect, that the raising of a Federal question in the brief might be sufficient, it is well settled in this court that it must be made to appear that some provision of the Federal, as distinguished from the state, Constitution, was relied upon, and that such provision must be set forth.

New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. New York, 186 U. S. 269, 46 L. ed. 1158, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 916.

Even if the state court has decided against the plaintiff in error on a Federal question, this court will not look into the Federal question if the state court has decided against the plaintiff in error on an independent ground sufficient to support the judgment, not involving a Federal question.

It is true that the plaintiff in error contends—and it is really its only contention—that the state court erred in its findings of fact. But those findings are conclusive on this court, and cannot be re-examined for any purpose.

It is evident on the face of the record that the question on the merits is not open to possible contention because it has previously been so specifically and adversely ruled on by this court as absolutely to foreclose further contention on the subject.

Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Brown, 187 U. S. 308, 47 L. ed. 190, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 123.

This is a writ of error to the supreme court of Washington on the ground that full faith and credit has not been given to a decree of divorce rendered in the state of Kansas. See 23 Wash. 132, 62 Pac. 862. The record is long, but all that is material to the case in this court can be stated in a few words. The defendants in error are the children of one F. M. Tull, and brought a complaint for the purpose, so far as the savings society, the plaintiff in error, is concerned, of establishing their right to an undivided share in certain land in Spokane, Washington, to which the savings society claims an absolute title. At least, that form of relief was held to be open under their complaint. Their claim was made on the ground that the land was community property of their parents, and that they inherited an undivided share upon their mother's death. The savings society claimed under the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by F. M. Tull. Before the execution of their mortgage, and after Tull had applied for a loan, his wife died, and probate proceedings were instituted under which Tull purported to purchase his children's interest as a preliminary to making the mortgage. It has been decided that these probate proceedings were void as against a purchaser with notice, and that the savings society took with notice. These are local matters, with which we have no concern. But the savings society contended that it had a good title, irrespective of these proceedings. The land was purchased with the proceeds of Kansas property which seems to have stood in the name of F. M. Tull. Tull procured a divorce in Kansas, [127] and, if that *divorce was valid, his wife's interest in his property was gone. Therefore, it is said, the land in Washington followed the character of the purchase money as his separate property, although, before the payment was completed, the divorced parties made up their differences, and were married to each other a second time.

The supreme court of Washington, trying the case de novo, found that Tull had changed his domicile from Kansas to Washington before beginning his divorce proceedings, and therefore that the decree was without jurisdiction, and void. It further found, on evidence satisfactory to itself, that, the divorce being out of the way, the property was joint or community property, and that his children had the right they claimed. With this last again we are not concerned, and the only question for us is whether the court could go behind the record of the Kansas case.

There is a motion to dismiss. It is said that the Federal question was not set up in the court below, and that the court put its decision on two distinct grounds, one of which was that the society was estopped to deny the children's title. The latter ground, it is said, was independent of the Federal question. But the opinion of the court deals expressly with the constitutional rights of the savings society, and the society seems to have insisted on those rights as soon as the divorce was attacked. Tullock v. Mulvane, 184 U. S. 497, 503, 504, 46 L. ed. 657, 662, 663, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 372. As to the other point, it is at least doubtful whether the court meant to find any estoppel except on the footing that the property was shown to be community property. The motion to dismiss is overruled. See Johnson v. Risk, 137 U. S. 300, 307, 34 L. ed. 683, 686, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111.

On the merits, however, the plaintiff in error has no case. It is suggested that the invalidity of the judgment for want of jurisdiction was not put in issue in the pleadings. It is a sufficient answer that the supreme court of the state treated it as in issue. Hill v. Mendenhall, 21 Wall. 453, 22 L. ed. 616, relied on by the plaintiff in error, came from the circuit court of the United *States, and when a case properly is [128] brought here from the circuit court upon constitutional grounds, the whole case is open. Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 570, 36 L. ed. 266, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522. But it is otherwise when a case comes, as this does, from a state court. Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 656, 41 L. ed. 586, 588, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214; McLaughlin v. Fowler, 154 U. S. 663, and 26 L. ed. 176, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1192; Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 590, 22 L. ed. 429.

It is too late now to deny the right collaterally to impeach a decree of divorce made in another state, by proof that the court had no jurisdiction, even when the record purports to show jurisdiction and the appearance of the other party. Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 39, 47 L. ed. 366, 372, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237, 176 Mass. 92, 93, 57 N. E. 333. An attempt was made to avoid the authority of Andrews v. Andrews by the suggestion that there the respondent in the divorce suit had disappeared before the decree. But a respondent cannot defeat jurisdiction by disappearing. Indeed, in strictness, only the attorney disappeared, and the respondent simply ceased to defend the suit. The effect given to the statute of Massachusetts in that case depended wholly on contradicting the record of the divorce suit and proving the want of jurisdiction by proving the libellant's want of domicile in the state.

It very well may be that, if the supreme court of Washington had undertaken to deny the jurisdiction of the Kansas tribunal without evidence impeaching it, such an evasion of the Constitution would not be upheld. It may be that in fact some circumstances were adverted to by that court which hardly warranted an inference. But it had before it the testimony of the husband, Tull, from which it appeared that before he made the contract for a part of the land in question he had sold out his property and business in Kansas, and had gone in search of what he called a new location, and that when he bought this land he decided to locate there. The land, it will be remembered, is in Spokane, Washington. Tull was there when the contract was made, and therefore there was ground for the court to find that at that moment he changed his domicile to Spokane. The contract was made on December 28, 1886, *and the libel for di- [129] vorce in Kansas was not filed until February 25, 1887. There was evidence warranting the finding, and that being so we take the facts as they were found. Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188, 41 L. ed. 680, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 300.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice McKenna dissents.

v.

GEORGE H. APPEL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 129-138.)

New trial—discharge of motion by operation of law—validity of territorial statutes providing for such discharge.

1. A motion for a new trial is to be deemed to be overruled at the end of the term, although continued to another term by an order in chambers made by the judge who tried the cause, because of his inability to attend, by virtue of Ariz. Rev. Stat. 1887, § 837, requiring motions for new trials to be "determined at the term of the court at which the motion shall be made,"—especially when considered in connection with § 842, as amended by Acts 1891, No. 49, providing for a review by the territorial supreme court of a denial of a motion for a new trial, and enacting that "in case there shall be no ruling on said motion for a new trial during the term at which it was filed, then said motion shall be denied."
2. An unconstitutional assumption of judicial functions was not made by the enactment of Ariz. Rev. Stat. 1887, § 837, which discharges a motion for a new trial by operation of law if not acted upon at the same term.
3. The grant by Congress of common-law jurisdiction to the Arizona courts, made by U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 1868, 1908, did not prevent the enactment of Ariz. Rev. Stat. 1887, § 837, which discharges a motion for a new trial by operation of law if not acted upon at the same term,—especially in view of the provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1866, that the jurisdiction given by § 1908 "shall be limited by law."

*Argued and submitted December 17, 1903.
Decided January 4, 1904.*

A PPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Arizona, which dismissed, because taken too late, an appeal from a judgment of the District Court of the First Judicial District in and for the County of Pima in that Territory, in favor of plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. F. Bowie argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Thomas B. Bishop and Bishop, Wheeler, & Hoefler, filed a brief for appellant:

In adopting and enacting a foreign statute decisions expounding it are adopted with it.

Ct. Rep. 142; Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 600, 40 L. ed. 822, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 369, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644; Henrietta Min. & Mill. Co. v. Gardner, 173 U. S. 130, 43 L. ed. 640, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327.

The constitutionality of a statute providing that a judgment shall be entered in certain cases has been expressly decided in Wyoming.

Barkwell v. Chatterton, 4 Wyo. 307, 33 Pac. 940.

After a judgment has been rendered upon a full hearing, it could hardly be considered an encroachment upon the judicial power if the trial court were denied altogether the right to change its decision.

Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

The simple disapproval by Congress at any time would have annulled the statute. It is no unreasonable inference, therefore, that it was approved by that body.

Clinton v. Englebrecht, 13 Wall. 434, 20 L. ed. 659; Canon v. United States, 171 U. S. 277, 43 L. ed. 163, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 855.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the supreme court of the territory of Arizona, dismissing an appeal because taken too late. The appellee recovered a sum from the appellant in the court of first instance, and, after judgment was entered, the appellant moved for a new trial. The judge who tried the case, being unable to attend, made an order in chambers, continuing the motion to another term. At a later term, after several similar continuances, the motion was overruled, and the appellant then appealed to the supreme court of the territory. These events took place before the passage of the Arizona Revised Statutes of 1901. (See par. 1479.) It is assumed that the appeal was too late if the judgment became [135] final at *the term when it was rendered (Revised Statutes of Arizona, 1887, par. 849), and we may assume further that the ground of dismissal was the paragraph of the Revised Statutes requiring that motions for new trials "shall be determined at the term of the court at which the motion shall be made." Rev. Stat. 1887, par. 837, and the further provision of par. 842. By the latter, as amended in 1891, "when, upon motion, a new trial is denied," a review by the supreme court is provided for, and it then is enacted that "in case there shall be no ruling on said motion for a new trial during the term at which it was filed, then said motion shall be denied, and the questions that may have been raised thereby shall be subject to review by the supreme court as if said motion had been overruled and exceptions thereto reserved and entered on the minutes of the court." Acts of 1891, No. 49, p. 69.

The Arizona par. 837 is copied from a similar section in the Texas Code, act of May 13, 1846, § 112, Hart's Dig. Texas Code, art. 766, 1 Sayles' Texas Civ. Stat. art. 1372. Long before its adoption in Arizona the latter section had been construed in Texas as mandatory, and as discharging a motion by operation of law if not acted upon at the same term. It was held to put it out of the power of the court to postpone the motion for a new trial to the next term, and then to act upon it. If the requirement could be avoided by a continuance, it would be made almost nugatory. McKean v. Ziller, 9 Tex. 58; Bullock v. Ballew, 9 Tex. 192 U. S.

498; Bass v. Hays, 38 Tex. 128. When a statute is taken in this way from another, even a foreign, state, it generally is presumed to be adopted with the construction which it has received. Tucker v. Oxley, 5 Cranch, 34, 42, 3 L. ed. 29, 31; Henrietta Min. & Mill. Co. v. Gardner, 173 U. S. 123, 130, 43 L. ed. 637, 640, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327; Com. v. Hartnett, 3 Gray, 450. See Coulam v. Doull, 133 U. S. 216, 33 L. ed. 596, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253. On this ground as well as that of the meaning of the words, the act had been construed as in Texas by the supreme court of Arizona. Ruff v. Hand, 24 Pac. 257. In view of the history of the section we shall spend no more time upon the question. Even *were it more [136] doubtful, we are of opinion that the amendment of 1891 to par. 842 makes the meaning plain. The words "then [necessarily after the end of the term] said motion shall be denied," show that the motion is disposed of at the end of the term. Furthermore, they do not mean that an order must be made out of term because of the failure to make an order within it, but mean that the motion shall be barred by the lapse of time, adopting the decision of the year before in Ruff v. Hand, and save an exception as if the motion had been denied by the court. The amendment assumes or enacts that the motion is to be deemed overruled at the end of the term, and has for its object to give the party an exception in case he appeals from the judgment, so that the propriety of granting the motion may be reviewed along with the other matters brought before the supreme court. See Spicer v. Simms (Ariz.) 57 Pac. 610.

It is urged that at least the statute cannot be meant to operate when the postponement is for the convenience of the court, and the case is likened to those where a judgment or order is entered nunc pro tunc in order to prevent a loss of rights through a delay caused by the court itself. But there is no need of an exception in such a case. The party's rights are saved, but transferred for consideration to a higher court, and were it otherwise we should hesitate to read the exception into such absolute words.

It is said that by the foregoing construction the legislature attempts an unconstitutional assumption of judicial functions. But this is a mistake, both in form and substance. In form, because the legislature does not direct a judgment, but merely removes an obstacle to a judgment already entered. (We need not consider whether a different construction would be adopted if the statute dealt with the time for entering judgments.) In substance, because we no more can doubt the power of the legislature to enact a statute of limitations for motions for a new trial than we can doubt its power to enact such a statute for the bringing of an action. It may be questioned [137] whether there would be any constitutional objection to a law making the original judgment final, and doing away with new trials altogether. "Rehearings, new trials, are not essential to due process of law, either in judicial or administrative proceedings." Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 426, 38 L. ed. 1031, 1036, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114. See Montana Co. v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co. 152 U. S. 160, 171, 38 L. ed. 398, 400, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506. The statute did not deal with the past, or purport to grant or refuse a new trial in a case or cases then pending, but performed the proper legislative function of laying down a rule for the future in a matter as to which it had authority to lay down rules. Whether the attempt to grant a review of the motion in case of an appeal or writ of error was valid is not before us. But certainly it does not seem an extraordinary stretch of legislative power to say that if the right to have a motion considered is lost in the lower court by lapse of time, the motion may be considered on appeal. There is no judgment by the legislature, but simply a qualification of the time limit if the case goes up.

Finally, it is argued that the sections, construed as we construe them, are inconsistent with the grant of common-law jurisdiction to the courts by Congress. Rev. Stat. §§ 1868, 1908. It is said that the right to grant new trials was a well-recognized incident of common-law jurisdiction, and that it cannot be taken away or cut down by the territorial legislature. In view of the provision in § 1866, that the jurisdiction given by § 1908 "shall be limited by law," and, indeed, apart from it, we should hesitate to say that the territorial legislature was prevented by the grant of common-law jurisdiction, in general words, from doing away with new trials altogether. A rule of practice like this does not touch jurisdiction in any proper sense. Ferris v. Higley, 20 Wall. 375, 22 L. ed. 383, cited by the appellant, has no application. Apart from other differences, that was a case of an attempt to confer original jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases, both in chancery and common law, upon the probate courts. We certainly see nothing to prohibit the local legislature from making this not unusual [138] or unreasonable rule. *See Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 18 Wall. 648, 21 L. ed. 966; Bent v. Thompson, 138 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 902, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 238; Grecley v. Winsor, 1 S. D. 618, 631, 48 N. W. 214.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK COUNTY NATIONAL BANK, Appt.,
v.

ALBERT P. MASSEY, Trustee in Bankruptcy of George H. Stege and Frederick H. Stege.

Bankruptcy—preferences—deposit in bank by insolvents.

Insolvents, by depositing money in a bank upon an open account, subject to check, do not thereby make a transfer of property amounting to a preference, which, under the bankruptcy act of 1898 (30 Stat. at L. 562, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3445), § 60a, will deprive the bank of its right under § 68a to set off the amount of such deposit remaining to the depositors' credit on the date of their adjudication in bankruptcy and to prove its claim against the bankrupt estate for the balance.

Argued December 11, 1903. Decided January 4, 1904.

APPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment which reversed an order of the District Court for the Southern District of New York, allowing a claim against a bankrupt's estate, and held that a preference must first be surrendered before the claim could be proved. Reversed, and the judgment of the District Court affirmed.

See same case below, 54 C. C. A. 116, 116 Fed. 342.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Latham G. Reed argued the cause, and, with Messrs. John M. Bowers and Bowers & Sands, filed a brief for appellant:

The relation of a depositor in a bank with the bank itself is that of debtor and creditor.

An exchange of values between an insolvent debtor and one of his creditors does not constitute a preference, because in such cases there is no diminution of the debtor's estate whereby creditors may be injured.

The bank had a banker's lien upon the balance of the general deposit account of the bankrupt for all indebtedness then due to it.

A banker's lien is not only a lien which springs purely by force and operation of law, but is one which is also, within the contemplation of law, agreed to by a customer of a bank when he opens a deposit account.

Myers v. New York County Nat. Bank, 36 App. Div. 482, 55 N. Y. Supp. 504.

The rule is that in general the assignee does not stand in a better position than the bankrupt himself, and can claim only what the latter might claim.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, reversing the order of the *district[142] court affirming the order of the referee in bankruptcy, allowing a claim against the estate of Stege & Brother. This claim was allowed against the contention of the trustee of the bankrupt, that it could not be proved until the bank should surrender a certain alleged preference given to them in contravention of the bankrupt act. The circuit court of appeals reversed the order of the district court, holding that the bank must first surrender the preference before it could be allowed to prove its claim. 54 C. C. A. 116, 116 Fed. 342. The circuit court of appeals made the following findings of fact:

"For a number of years past the bankrupts, George H. Stege and Frederick H. Stege, were engaged, in the city and county of New York, in the business of dealing in butter, eggs, etc., at wholesale, under the firm name and style of Stege & Brother. On January 27, 1900, they filed a voluntary petition of bankruptcy in the district court, with liabilities of $67,232.49 and assets of $20,729.66, and upon the same day were duly adjudicated bankrupts. Among their liabilities there was an indebtedness of $40,000 to the New York County National Bank for money loaned upon four promissory notes for $10,000 each. The money was loaned to the bankrupts and the notes were originally given as follows:

"April 26, 1899, $10,000, 6 months, due October 26, 1899.

"April 26, 1899, $10,000, 7 months, due November 26, 1899.

"June 26, 1899, $10,000, 4 months, due October 26, 1899.

"August 2, 1899, $10,000, 4 months, due December 2, 1899.

"None of these notes were paid when they fell due, but were all renewed as follows:

"October 26, 1899, $10,000, 3 months, due January 26, 1900.

"November 26, 1899, $10,000, 75 days, due February 9, 1900.

"October 26, 1899, $10,000, 3 months, due January 26, 1900.

"December 2, 1899, $10,000, 69 days, due February 9, 1900.

[143] "On January 23, 1900, in the morning, the bankrupts went to the New York County National Bank and asked the officers to have the two notes of $10,000 each, which fell due on January 26, extended. The bankrupts at that time informed the bank officers that they were unable to pay the notes then about to fall due. In the afternoon of the same day, January 23, 1900, the bankrupts again called upon the bank officers, and at that time they delivered to them a statement of their assets and liabilities, which statement was not delivered until after the deposit of $3,884.47 had been made on that day. This statement as of January 22, 1900, showed their assets to be $19,095.67 and their liabilities $65,864.61.

"The bankrupts kept their bank account in the New York County National Bank since May 6, 1899. On January 22, 1900, their balance in the bank was $218.50. On the same day they deposited in that account $536.83; on January 23, 1900, $3,884.47; on January 25, 1900, $1,803.95, making a total of $6,225.25 deposited in the three days mentioned. Of this amount there was left in the bank account on the day of the adjudication in bankruptcy, January 27, 1900, the sum of $6,209.25, the bank having honored a check of Stege Brothers after the date of all these deposits.

"At the first meeting of creditors, February 9, 1900, the New York County National Bank filed its claim for $33,790.25.

"In its proof of claim the bank credited upon one of the notes which became due on January 26, 1900, the deposit of $6,209.25. The claim was allowed by the referee in the sum of $33,750.25, being $40,000 less the amount on deposit in bank ($6,209.25) and a small rebate of interest on the unmatured notes. Some of the creditors at this meeting reserved the right to move to reconsider the claim of the New York County National Bank; the referee granted this request. Afterwards the trustee, as the representative of the creditors, moved before the referee to disallow and to expunge from his list of claims the claim of the New York County National Bank unless it surrendered the amount of the deposit, namely, $6,209.25, which had been credited by the bank upon one of the notes. The referee denied that motion, and an appropriate order was made and entered. The trustee thereupon duly filed his petition to have the question certified to the district judge. The district judge on *the 25th day of November, 1901, made an order affirming the order of the referee. From that order an appeal was duly taken by the trustee to the circuit court of appeals. The deposits were made in the usual course of business; at the time they were made Stege Brothers were insolvent."

As a conclusion of law, the court of appeals held that the deposit would amount to a transfer enabling the bank to obtain a greater percentage of the debt due to it than other creditors of the same class, and that allowance of the claim should be refused unless the preference was surrendered. This case requires an examination of certain provisions of the bankrupt law. Section 68 of that law provides:

"Sec. 68. Set-offs and counterclaims:

"(a.) In all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the estate of a bankrupt and a creditor, the account shall be stated and one debt shall be set-off against the other and the balance only shall be allowed or paid.

"(b.) A set-off or counterclaim shall not be allowed in favor of any debtor of the bankrupt which (1) is not provable against the estate, or (2) was purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition or within four months before such filing, with a view to such use and with knowledge or notice that such bankrupt was insolvent or had committed an act of bankruptcy."

Section 60 provides (prior to the amendment of February 5, 1903):

"Sec. 60. Preferred creditors: a. A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has . . . made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the . . . transfer will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class."

Section 57*g* provides (prior to amendment of February 5, 1903): "Claims of creditors who have received preferences shall not be allowed unless such creditors shall surrender their preferences." [30 Stat. at L. 560, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3443.]

[145] *Considering, for the moment, § 68, apart from the other sections, subdivision a contemplates a set-off of mutual debts or credits between the estate of the bankrupt and the creditor, with an account to be stated and the balance only to be allowed and paid. Subdivision b makes certain specific exceptions to this allowance of set-off, and provides that it shall not be allowed in favor of the debtor of the bankrupt upon an unproved claim or one transferred to the debtor after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or within four months before the filing thereof, with a view to its use for the purpose of set-off, with knowledge or notice that the bankrupt was insolvent or had committed an act of bankruptcy. Obviously, the present case does not come within the exceptions to the general rule made by subdivision b. It cannot be doubted that, except under special circumstances, or where there is a statute to the contrary, a deposit of money upon general account with a bank creates the relation of debtor and creditor. The money deposited becomes a part of the general fund of the bank, to be dealt with by it as other moneys, to be lent to customers, and parted with at the will of the bank, and the right of the depositor is to have this debt repaid in whole or in part by honoring checks drawn against the deposits. It creates an ordinary debt, not a privilege or right of a fiduciary character. National Bank v. Millard, 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 897. Or, as defined by Mr. Justice White, in the case of Davis v. Elmira Sav. Bank, 161 U. S. 288, 40 L. ed. 702, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 505: "The deposit of money by a customer with his banker is one of loan, with the superadded obligation that the money is to be paid, when demanded, by a check." Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 369, 23 L. ed. 485. It is true that the findings of fact in this case establish that at the time these deposits were made the assets of the depositors were considerably less than their liabilities, and that they were insolvent, but there is nothing in the findings to show that the deposit created other than the ordinary relation between the bank and its depositor. The check of the depositor was honored after this deposit was made, and for aught that appears Stege Brothers might have required the amount of the entire account without objection from the bank, notwithstanding their financial condition.

We are to interpret statutes, not to make them. Unless other sections of the law are controlling, or, in order to give a harmonious construction to the whole act, a different interpretation is required, it would seem clear that the parties stood in the relation defined in § 68*a*, with the right to set off mutual debts, the creditor being allowed to prove but the balance of the debt.

Section 68*a* of the bankruptcy act of 1898 is almost a literal reproduction of § 20 of the act of 1867. [14 Stat. at L. 526, chap. 176, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418.] So far as we have been able to discover the holdings were uniform under that act that set-off should be allowed as between a bank and a depositor becoming bankrupt. Re Petrie, 7 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 332, 5 Ben. 110, Fed. Cas. No. 11,040; Blair v. Allen, 3 Dill. 101, Fed. Cas. No. 1,483; Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 362, 23 L. ed. 483. In Traders' Nat. Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. 87, 20 L. ed. 832, the right of set-off was not relied upon, but a deposit was seized on a judgment which was a preference.

But it is urged that under § 60*a* this transaction amounts to giving a preference to the bank, by enabling it to receive a greater percentage of its debts than other creditors of the same class. A transfer is defined in § 1 (25) of the act to include the sale and every other and different method of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security. While these sections are not to be narrowly construed so as to defeat their purpose, no more can they be enlarged by judicial construction to include transactions not within the scope and purpose of the act. This section, 1 (25), read with §§ 57*g* and 60*a*, requires the surrender of preferences having the effect of transfers of property "as payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security which operate to diminish the estate of the bankrupt and prefer one creditor over another."

[147] *The law requires the surrender of such preferences given to the creditor within the time limited in the act before he can prove his claim. These transfers of property, amounting to preferences, contemplate the parting with the bankrupt's property for the benefit of the creditor, and the consequent diminution of the bankrupt's estate. It is such transactions, operating to defeat the purposes of the act, which, under its terms, are preferences.

As we have seen, a deposit of money to one's credit in a bank does not operate to diminish the estate of the depositor, for when he parts with the money he creates at the same time, on the part of the bank, an obligation to pay the amount of the deposit as soon as the depositor may see fit to draw a check against it. It is not a transfer of property as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security. It is true that it creates a debt, which, if the creditor may set it off under § 68, amounts to permitting a creditor of that class to obtain more from the bankrupt's estate than creditors who are not in the same situation, and do not hold any debts of the bankrupt subject to set-off. But this does not, in our opinion, operate to enlarge the scope of the statute defining preferences so as to prevent set-off in cases coming within the terms of § 68a. If this argument were to prevail, it would, in cases of insolvency, defeat the right of set-off recognized and enforced in the law, as every creditor of the bankrupt holding a claim against the estate subject to reduction to the full amount of a debt due the bankrupt receives a preference in the fact that, to the extent of the set-off, he is paid in full.

It is insisted that this court in the case of Pirie v. Chicago Title & T. Co. 182 U. S. 438, 48 L. ed. 1171, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 906, held a payment of money to be a transfer of property within the terms of the bankrupt act, and, when made by an insolvent within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, to amount to a preference, and that case is claimed to be decisive of this. In the Pirie Case the turning question was whether the payment of money was a transfer within the meaning of the law, [148] and it was held *that it was. There the payment of the money within the time named in the bankrupt law was a parting with so much of the bankrupt's estate, for which he received no obligation of the debtor but a credit for the amount on his debt. This was held to be a transfer of property within the meaning of the law. It is not necessary to depart from the ruling made in that case, that such payment was within the operation of the law, while a deposit of money upon an open account subject to check, not amounting to a payment, but creating an obligation upon the part of the bank to repay upon the order of the depositor, would not be. Of the case of Pirie v. Chicago Title & T. Co. it was said in Jaquith v. Alden, 189 U. S. 78, 82, 47 L. ed. 717, 719, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649, 650: "The judgment below was affirmed by this court, and it was held that a payment of money was a transfer of property, and when made on an antecedent debt by an insolvent was a preference within § 60a, although the creditor was ignorant of the insolvency, and had no reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended. The estate of the insolvent, as it existed at the date of the insolvency, was diminished by the payment, and the creditor who received it was enabled to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of the creditors of the same class."

In other words, the Pirie Case, under the facts stated, shows a transfer of property to be applied upon the debt, made at the time of insolvency of the debtor, creating a preference under the terms of the bankrupt law. That case turned upon entirely different facts, and is not decisive of the one now before us. It is true, as we have seen, that in a sense the bank is permitted to obtain a greater percentage of its claim against the bankrupt than other creditors of the same class, but this indirect result is not brought about by the transfer of property within the meaning of the law. There is nothing in the findings to show fraud or collusion between the bankrupt and the bank with a view to create a preferential transfer of the bankrupt's property to the bank, and in the absence of such showing we cannot regard the deposit as having other effect than *to create a debt to the bank-[149] rupt, and not a diminution of his estate.

In our opinion the referee and the district court were right in holding that the amount of the deposit could be set off against the claim of the bank, allowing it to prove for the balance, and the circuit court of appeals, in holding that this deposit amounted to a preference, to be surrendered before proving the debt, committed error.

Judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, and that of the District Court affirmed; cause remanded to latter court.

Mr. Justice McKenna dissents.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

RUPERTO MARTIN, as Executor of the Will of Francisco Martin, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 149-167.)

Appeal — direct review of judgment of district court for Porto Rico — insurance — loss during riot — independent causes — waiver of formal proof — change in interest — separate insurance.

1. A direct review in the Supreme Court of the United States of a judgment of the district court for the district of Porto Rico in an action on a policy of insurance issued by a foreign corporation in which the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $5,000 may be had on writ of error to the latter court, under the act of April 12, 1900 (31 Stat. at L. 85, chap. 191), § 35, providing for the allowance of such writs of error in the same manner, under the same regulations, and in the same cases as from the supreme courts of the territories, since the judgment, if rendered by a territorial supreme court, would not have been reviewable in the circuit court of appeals under the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 547), § 15, on the theory that the case was one of the class in which the judgments of the latter court are made final by § 6 of that act, nor is the question affected by the provision in the acts relating to the re-examination in certain designated circuit courts of appeals of judgments of the highest courts of the Indian territory, Hawaii, and Alaska.
2. The effect of a provision in a policy of insurance that it shall not cover loss or damage by fire happening during the existence of a riot within the country or locality in which the property is situated unless proof be made, to the satisfaction of the directors, that such loss or damage was due to independent causes, is to entitle the company to demand such proof before being sued.
3. A denial by an insurance company of all liability under its policy dispenses with the necessity of furnishing the proofs that the loss occurred from independent causes,—which the company, under the policy, was entitled to demand before it could be sued, where the fire happened during the existence of a riot in the country or locality where the property was situated,—and opens the way for a suit by the insured, where the rights of the parties can be determined according to the facts as disclosed by the evidence.
4. A policy under which a building and a stock in trade contained therein were sep-ately insured for distinct and different amounts is not avoided as respects the insurance on the building by a change in the ownership of such stock in trade without notice to the insurance company, although the policy provides that it shall cease to be in force as to any property thereby insured which shall pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by due operation of law, unless notice thereof be given to the company.

5. A transfer by an insured, without notice to the insurance company, of his entire stock in trade to a firm in which he is a silent partner, discharges the company from all liability under a policy insuring such stock in trade, which provided that it should cease to be in force as to any property insured which should pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by operation of law, unless notice be given to the company.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Porto Rico to review a judgment entered on a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in an action on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William G. Choate argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The appellate jurisdiction of this court from supreme courts of the territories remains unimpaired, except as such appellate jurisdiction is transferred to the circuit courts of appeals by the act of 1891.

Shute v. Keyser, 149 U. S. 649, 37 L. ed. 884, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960; Aztec Min. Co. v. Ripley, 151 U. S. 79, 38 L. ed. 80, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236; Polson v. United States, 160 U. This case does not fall within either of the five enumerated cases by which, under the act of 1891, the judgments or decrees of the circuit courts of appeals are made final.

A transfer to a firm including the insured is a transfer within the condition of the policy, and avoids it.

Such a provision including a change of title or interest is provided by the courts as just and reasonable.

Cases in the supreme court of Iowa subsequent to the case of Cowan v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 40 Iowa, 551, 20 Am. Rep. 583, which is relied on by the defendant in error, distinguish that case on the ground that there was no provision in the policy in that case relating to a change of title or interest, but a provision merely in respect to a sale or conveyance which was held to mean a technical sale of the whole property.

The company may not in this court juggle away the evident meaning and intent of the condition, and make it mean something that it never said, namely, that the burden of proof in an action at law should be upon the insured to show that the fire had not been caused by the riot.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the executor of the insured on a policy of insurance made by the Royal Insurance Company, a British corporation, whereby that company insured Francisco Martin against loss or damage by fire to the amount of £700 on a certain building at Coto Laurel, district of Ponce, Porto Rico, and for £900 on the stock in trade contained in such building.

The declaration alleged, and the fact was not disputed, that during the term of the policy all the property insured was destroyed by fire. The case was tried by the court and a jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for $7,623, the court refusing to require the jury to find the damages, separately, as to the building and the stock of goods; and for the above amount judgment was rendered against the company.

The defendant in error disputes the jurisdiction of this court to review the judgment below. If this position be well taken, the writ of error should be dismissed without considering the merits of the case. Continental Nat. Bank v. Buford, 191 U. S. 119, ante, 119, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54. We must therefore examine the question of the jurisdiction, which depends upon the scope and effect of various statutory provisions, including those relating to the court established by Congress in Porto Rico. We will look at the statutes according to the respective dates of their enactment.

[156] *By § 702 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 571), it is provided that "the final judgments and decrees of the supreme court of any territory except the territory of Washington, in cases where the value of the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, . . . exceeds $1,000, may be reviewed and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court [of the United States] upon writ of error or appeal, in the same manner and under the same regulations as the final judgments and decrees of a circuit court. In the territory of Washington the value of the matter in dispute must exceed $2,000, exclusive of costs. And any final judgment or decree of the supreme court of said territory in any cause [when] the Constitution or a statute or treaty of the United States is brought in question may be reviewed in like manner."

This provision was modified by the act of March 3d, 1885, entitled "An Act Regulating Appeals from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the Supreme Courts of the Several Territories;" for by the latter act it was provided: "§ 1. That no appeal or writ of error shall hereafter be allowed from any judgment or decree in any suit at law or in equity in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or in the supreme court of any of the territories of the United States, unless the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of $5,000. § 2. That the preceding section shall not apply to any case wherein is involved the validity of any patent or copyright, or in which is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States; but in all such cases an appeal or writ of error may be brought without regard to the sum or value in dispute." 23 Stat. at L. 443, chap. 355, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 572.

Then came the act of March 3d, 1891, "to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes." 26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 547. The 5th section of that act prescribes the cases that may be brought directly to this court from the district courts or from the existing circuit courts of *the[157] United States, while the 6th section provides that the circuit courts of appeals "shall exercise appellate jurisdiction to review by appeal or by writ of error final decision in the district court and the existing circuit courts in all cases other than those provided for in the preceding section of this act, unless otherwise provided by law;" the judgments or decrees of the circuit court of appeals to be final "in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the opposite parties to the suit or controversy being aliens and citizens of the United States, or citizens of different states; also in all cases arising under the patent laws, under the revenue laws, and under the criminal laws, and in admiralty cases." Further, by the same section: "In all cases not hereinbefore, in this [6th] section, made final, there shall be of right an appeal or writ of error or review of the case by the Supreme Court of the United States where the matter in controversy shall exceed $1,000, besides costs." § 6. The 13th section of the act provides: "Appeals and writs of error may be taken and prosecuted from the decisions of the United States court in the Indian territory to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to the circuit court of appeals in the eighth circuit, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit or district courts of the United States, under this act." And the 15th section is in these words: "That the circuit court of appeal in cases in which the judgments of the circuit courts of appeal are made final by this act shall have the same appellate jurisdiction, by writ of error or appeal, to review the judgments, orders, and decrees of the supreme courts of the several territories as by this act they may have to review the judgments, orders, and decrees of the district court and circuit courts; and for that purpose the several territories shall, by orders of the Supreme Court, to be made from time to time, be assigned to particular circuits." 26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 547.

This brings us to the act of April 12th, 1900, chap. 191, entitled, "An Act Temporarily to Provide Revenues and a Civil Government *for Porto Rico, and for Other[158] Purposes." 31 Stat. at L. 85.

By § 33 of that act it is declared, among other things, that the judicial power shall be vested in the courts and tribunals of Porto Rico as then established and in operation, under and by virtue of certain general orders promulgated by military authority, —the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of Porto Rico, and the marshal thereof, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the judges of the district courts by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the executive council.

By the 34th section of that act Porto Rico was constituted a judicial district, to be called the district of Porto Rico, with a district judge, a district attorney, and marshal, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with a district court called the "district court of the United States for Porto Rico," which court, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction of district courts of the United States, shall have jurisdiction of all cases cognizant in the circuit courts of the United States.

The section of the Porto Rico act upon which the question of our jurisdiction mainly depends is the 35th, which is in these words: "That writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the supreme court of Porto Rico and the district court of the United States shall be allowed and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and under the same regulations and in the same cases as from the supreme courts of the territories of the United States; and such writs of error and appeal shall be allowed in all cases where the Constitution of the United States, or a treaty thereof, or an act of Congress, is brought in question, and the right claimed thereunder is denied; and the supreme and district courts of Porto Rico, and the respective judges thereof, may grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases in which the same are grantable by the judges of the [159] district and circuit courts of the *United States. All such proceedings in the Supreme Court of the United States shall be conducted in the English language." 31 Stat. at L. 85, chap. 191.

It thus appears that writs of error and appeals may be prosecuted directly to this court from the district court of the United States for Porto Rico, in the same manner, under the same regulations, and "in the same cases" as from the supreme courts of the territories of the United States.

Could a case like the one before us have been brought directly to this court from the supreme court of one of the territories of the United States? If so, our jurisdiction in this case cannot be disputed under the Porto Rico act.

The question just stated must be answered in the affirmative, if we look alone at § 702 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 571), and the act of March 3d, 1885, chap. 355 (23 Stat. at L. 443, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 572); for it is clear from the express words of those enactments that this court may review the final judgment of the supreme court of one of the territories of the United States in any case, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, where the Constitution or a statute or treaty is brought in question, and in every other case whatever where the sum or value in dispute exceeds $5,000, exclusive of costs.

Is this result, so far as the final judgments of the district court of the United States for Porto Rico are concerned, affected by anything in the circuit court of appeals act of 1891? We think not. That act, no doubt, contemplated a review by the appropriate circuit court of appeals, first, of the final judgments of the United States court in the Indian territory in all cases covered by § 702 of the Revised Statutes and the act of March 3d, 1891; second, of the final judgments of the supreme courts of the other territories of the United States in cases the judgments in which, by that act (§ 6), are made final. No provision is found in the act of 1891 for the review in a circuit court of appeals of the judgment of the supreme court of a territory of the United States in a case of the class the judgment in which, if rendered in a circuit court of appeals, is not final. So that the jurisdiction *of this court to review the [160] judgments of the supreme courts of the several territories in that class of cases was the same after as before the passage of that act. Shute v. Keyser, 149 U. S. 649, 651, 37 L. ed. 884, 885, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960. Clearly, this case is not of the class the judgment in which, if rendered in the supreme court of a territory of the United States, to use the words of the act of 1891, is reviewable in a circuit court of appeals under that act. It is not a patent, revenue, or criminal case, nor one in which the jurisdiction of the court below depended entirely upon the opposite parties to the controversy being aliens and citizens of the United States or citizens of different states. But it is one which, if it had been determined by the supreme court of one of such territories of the United States, could have been brought here directly, upon writ of error, after as well as before the passage of the act of 1891. Our conclusion must, therefore, be that the jurisdiction of this court cannot be denied by reason of any provision in the act of 1891.

This view is strengthened by what we deem the better construction of the Porto Rico act of 1900. That act does not refer to the circuit court of appeals act of 1891, nor contain any provision looking to the assignment of Porto Rico to one of the established circuits. This tends to show that it was the intention of the act of 1900 to establish a direct connection between this court and the United States court for Porto Rico in respect of every case which, if determined by the supreme court of a territory of the United States, could have been brought here under the statutes in force when the act of 1891 was passed. In our opinion, Congress did not intend that any connection should exist between the United States court for Porto Rico and any circuit court of appeals established under the act of 1891.

These views as to the scope and effect of the Porto Rico act of 1900 are not at all affected by the provisions in the acts relating to the re-examination of the final judgments of the highest courts of the Indian territory, Hawaii, and Alaska. "Indian Territory," 26 Stat. at L. 829, chap. 517, § 13, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 553; "Hawaii," [161] 31 Stat. at L. 141, 158, *chap. 339, § 86; "Alaska," 31 Stat. at L. 321, 345, chap. 786. Those acts had exclusive reference to the particular territories named; each, upon its face, showing that the final judgments of the courts of those territories, at least in certain cases, should be reviewable, primarily, in a designated circuit court of appeals of the United States. No such provisions are found in the act of 1900, and this court has not assumed to assign Porto Rico to any circuit of the United States. The territories of the United States, referred to in the 15th section of the act of 1891, are, in our opinion, those which it was contemplated would be assigned to some circuit, and they do not embrace Porto Rico; and the words in the act of 1900, "in the same manner and under the same regulations and in the same cases as from the supreme court of a territory of the United States," refer not to the act of 1891, but to those general statutes authorizing this court to review the final judgment of the supreme court of a territory of the United States in every case, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, where the Constitution of the United States or a treaty thereof or an act of Congress is brought in question, and the right claimed thereunder is denied, and in every other case where the sum or value in dispute exceeds $5,000, exclusive of costs. If Congress had intended that the judgments of the United States court for Porto Rico should, in any class of cases, be re-examined in some circuit court of appeals of the United States, it would have so declared by appropriate words. It did not so declare.

For the reasons stated, we hold that our jurisdiction to re-examine it cannot be questioned.

We come now to the merits of the case; our attention being first directed to the questions arising under that clause of the policy providing that it shall not cover "loss or damage by fire happening during the existence of any invasion, foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law within the country or locality in which the property insured is situated, unless proof be made to the satisfaction of the directors that such loss or damage *was not occasioned [162] by or connected with, but occurred from a cause or causes independent of, the existence of such invasion, foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law."

As the words of the policy are those of the company, they should be taken most strongly against it, and the interpretation should be adopted which is most favorable to the insured, if such interpretation be not inconsistent with the words used. First Nat. Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 95 U. S. 673, 678, 679, 24 L. ed. 563, 565; Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 180 U. S. 132, 136, 45 L. ed. 460, 462, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 326; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Reiss, 183 U. S. 621, 626, 46 L. ed. 358, 360, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253. In this view the above words should be held to mean that the policy covered loss by fire occurring during the existence of (if not occasioned by nor connected with) any invasion, foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law, in the general locality where the property insured was situated. If the loss so occurred, then the company was entitled to demand, before being sued, that proofs be furnished showing that the loss was not occasioned by or connected with, but was from causes independent of, such invasion, foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law. But the company made no demand for proofs on this point. On the contrary, the formal production of such proofs was, in effect, waived; for the company assumed that what occurred in the locality at the time of the fire constituted a riot, which relieved it from all liability. It, therefore, gave notice by its agents that, as the fire and the destruction of the goods "were produced by a riot, they were not compelled to pay," and that "the policy would not be paid." A general, absolute refusal to pay in any event, or a denial by the company of all liability under its policy, dispensed with such formal proofs as a condition of its liability to be sued, and opened the way for a suit by the assured in order that the rights of the parties could be determined by the courts according to the facts as disclosed by evidence. It was so held by this court in a case of fire *insurance (Taylor v. Merchants' F. Ins. [163] Co. 9 How. 390, 403, 13 L. ed. 187, 192); and the same principle was recognized as applicable in a case of life insurance. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Pendleton, 112

U. S. 696, 709, 28 L. ed. 866, 870, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 314. To the same effect are authorities cited by text-writers. 2 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 469; 2 Biddle, Ins. § 1139; 2 Wood, Fire Ins. 2d ed. § 445. Now, whether there was any substantial connection between the fire and military or other disturbance of the kind specified existing in the locality where the property was situated was a question of fact, and it was properly left to the jury. The court, referring to the above clause of the policy, charged the jury: "A fair construction of that condition, in the opinion of the court, is that, in order to excuse this company from liability in case of loss of property by fire, that invasion by foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law must have been occurring within the section of the country where this loss occurred, or within the locality and within such radius of country where the loss occurred that damage arose to property by reason of the existence of that rebellion, invasion, insurrection, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law. And I further tell you, gentlemen, that if you believe from the evidence that this destruction of property did not occur from any of these causes, and occurred from a cause independent of the existence of any foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, military or usurped power, or martial law, then you should find, so far as this defense was concerned, for the plaintiff in damages whatever you think may have been his loss."

While there is some little confusion in this part of the record, we think that the trial court did not misconstrue the policy, nor commit any error upon this particular point of which the plaintiff was entitled to complain. It is to be taken that the jury found, upon the whole evidence, that the loss was occasioned by causes independent of the existence of any invasion, foreign enemy, rebellion, insurrection, riot, [164] civil commotion, *military or usurped power or martial law. The facts under this issue having been fairly submitted to the jury, its finding cannot be disturbed.

An important question remains to be considered. It arises out of the interest which the assured had in the property at the time of the fire. The evidence showed that the original policy was issued to Francisco Martin on the 12th day of March, 1877, he being at that time the sole owner of the building and of the goods contained in it. The policy was renewed from year to year, the last one being dated March 12th, 1898, and extending until March 12th, 1899. The fire occurred in August, 1898, the assured being then alive. He did not die until October, 1899. Now, at the time of the fire, the goods insured had, by act of the assured, become, in their entirety, the property of Martin Brothers, a firm or society composed of two sons of the assured as active partners, and of himself as silent partner. The father turned over the business to the control and management of the two sons, and to them surrendered the custody of the goods constituting the stock in trade. At what date the sons acquired their interests in the goods and in the business does not distinctly appear. But it was before the fire; and of the change whereby the father ceased to be the sole owner of the goods described in the renewal policy and whereby also they became the property of the firm of Martin Brothers, no notice whatever was given to the company prior to the fire.

The question is whether such change in the ownership of the goods insured—no change occurring in the ownership of the building—discharged the company from all liability on the policy under that clause providing that the policy should cease "to be in force as to any property hereby insured which shall pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by due operation of law, unless notice thereof be given to the company, and the subsistence of the insurance in favor of such other person be declared by a memorandum indorsed hereon by or on behalf of the company."

Upon the question whether an insurance policy of the general *class to which the one [165] in suit belongs continues in force after a sale or transfer by the assured of his interest in the property insured, the adjudged cases are by no means in accord, and it will serve no useful purpose to make an extended review of them and show wherein they differ. It will be found upon examination that each policy contained language peculiar to itself, and upon that language the particular case turned. Of course, in every case, the fundamental inquiry must be as to the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the words of the policy; always, however, interpreting the policy most favorably for the insured, where it is reasonably susceptible of two constructions.

On the face of the policy in suit it appears that the buildings and the goods contained in them were insured separately,—£700 on the building and £900 on the stock in trade. One construction of the policy is that if either the building or the stock in trade should pass from the assured to another person, then the policy should cease as to all the property insured. But another construction, the one most favorable to the assured, which is not unreasonnable, and which is not forbidden by the words used, is that, as the building and the stock in trade were separately insured, the policy should cease to be in force only as to the particular property insured that passed from the assured without notice to the company. The latter is the better construction, and we hold that it is to be considered as if the building was covered by one policy and the goods by another. Whatever may have been the extent of the interest acquired by the firm of Martin Bros. in the goods, no interest in the building passed to them. The building remained, in its entirety, the sole property of the assured, up to the time of the fire, and the policy may reasonably be, and therefore ought to be, so construed as not to preclude a recovery in respect of its destruction by fire.

But in respect of the goods in question, the case depends upon other considerations. When the goods were insured they were, in their entirety, the sole property of Francisco [166]co *Martin, the assured. He was the legal owner of the whole of them. They were in his custody, and subject to his exclusive control. But at the time of their destruction by fire the ownership of the goods, in their entirety, had, by transfer from the assured, passed to Martin Brothers, and became, without notice to the company, subject to the exclusive control, in their entirety, of that firm. Such a change of ownership and control, it must be held, avoided the policy, unless it was kept alive by the mere fact that the assured, although taking no active part in the business of the firm, was yet a silent partner, and as such had some interest in the insured property. But that fact cannot be given the weight suggested, without ignoring altogether the reasons which, it must be assumed, induced the company to incorporate into its policy the provision that if any property insured passed from the assured to another person without notice to the company, the policy should cease to be in force. It may well be that an insurance company would be willing to insure property owned by a particular person of whose character and habits its agent had knowledge or information, but unwilling to insure the same property if owned by that person in connection with others. Prudence requires that a company, before insuring against fire, should be informed as to the actual ownership of the property proposed to be insured, and know who, in virtue of such ownership, will be entitled to its custody and to control it during the term of the policy. The provision that the policy in this case should cease to be in force from the moment the insured property passed from the assured to others without notice to the company implied not only that the company relied upon the integrity and watchfulness of the assured, but that, if he looked to the company for indemnity against loss by fire, he must take care not to allow the property to "pass" from him to others, without notice to the insurer. The assured, without notice to the company, did pass the goods in question to a firm, each member of which thereby acquired an interest in the whole of the goods transferred. The ownership of the firm was, in law *and in fact, [167] distinct from the original sole ownership of the assured. Practically, for all purposes of guarding the goods insured against destruction by fire, they passed to the active partners, who were strangers to the property at the date of the policy,—the assured, as a silent partner, retaining no interest in any particular part of the goods, and being under no obligation as between himself and the active partners to care for the safety of the property. Its safety, after the transfer, depended altogether upon the watchfulness of the active partners, in whose possession the goods were up to the fire. It only remained for the original sole owner, after passing the goods in their entirety to the firm of Martin Brothers, in which he was a silent partner, to receive such profits as accrued to him from their use in the business as conducted by the active partners.

We are of opinion that the case was not tried in accordance with a sound construction of the terms of the policy relating to the goods insured. The court proceeded upon the ground that there was no evidence of such alienation or change of ownership as avoided the policy in respect of the goods. In this error was committed, and a new trial must be had in conformity with the views we have herein expressed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to set aside the judgment, and grant a new trial.

questioning the completeness of the title acquired by a mortgagee by virtue of a delivery to him of the mortgaged property, during which time he has successfully dealt with it as his own, is fatal to the right to rescind the contract under which the delivery was made, and to treat him as a mortgagee in possession because of the breach of his agreement to cancel the mortgage and surrender certain notes, although he has brought an action upon one of the notes to recover a sum equal to the value of that portion of the property which was not delivered as agreed, instead of an action in form for the value of such undelivered property.

2. The right to rescind a contract under which certain mortgaged property was delivered to the mortgagee, and to treat him as a mortgagee in possession, after he has successfully dealt with the property for several years, cannot be founded upon his failure to cancel the mortgage and surrender certain notes, where a delivery of all the property described in the contract was not made, and his duty to surrender and cancel the notes and mortgage was conditioned upon a complete delivery.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

The facts in this case are few and beyond dispute, most of them being shown by the averments in the answer of the defendant Sherman. On August 23, 1889, Ward, the plaintiff and appellant, sold to the defendants the Sunflower range, together with the cattle thereon and other personal property. A conveyance was, by agreement, made to the defendant Hardenberg, who, to secure a part of the purchase price, to wit, $25,000, evidenced by two notes of $12,500 each, made by Hardenberg and guaranteed by Sherman, executed a mortgage of the cattle and some other property. Thereafter the defendants incorporated themselves under the laws of the territory of Arizona as the Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company, and transferred to it all of the property above

[169] mentioned, *subject to the payment of the two notes held by the plaintiff. On September 12, 1894, an agreement was entered into between the company and the plaintiff which, after reciting the indebtedness, reads as follows:

"Whereas, the said party of the second part is unable to pay to said party of the first part the said sum of $14,500, due on October 1, 1894, and has notified said party of the first part that it will be unable to pay said sum at said time; and

"Whereas, said party of the second part desires to deliver up and turn over to said party of the first part all of the property heretofore purchased by one David Hardenberg of the party of the first part, and for which said notes were given as a part of the purchase money:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the promises and agreements of said party of the first part, the said party of the second part hereby agrees to and with said party of the first part to transfer and convey by proper deeds of conveyance and bills of sale all of the real and personal property heretofore purchased by the said David Hardenberg of the said party of the first part; also, all personal and real property owned by the said party of the second part in the territory of Arizona, in whomsoever's name the same may now stand, to said party of the first part, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: The Sunflower Cattle Range in Maricopa county, Arizona territory; all cattle, horses, mules, or burros branded with either of the following brands: Diamond brand, thus: ◇; H. B. brand, thus: HB; also all wagons, mowing machines, farming implements, and camp outfit, and everything pertaining to or used by said Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company, excepting only from the provision of said conveyance such cattle as shall have been sold and delivered by said Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company prior or to September 1, 1894, it being understood that all stock cattle which may have been sold subsequent to September 1, 1894, shall be accounted for by the party of the second part to said party of the first part.

"That in consideration of the said party of the second part *conveying to said party of [170] the first part of all of the property hereinbefore described within thirty days from the date thereof, and delivering possession of the same to said party of the first part or his authorized agent, in said county of Maricopa aforesaid, the said party of the first part hereby covenants and agrees to deliver to said David Hardenberg and one M. H. Sherman two promissory notes, each for $12,500, one of which matures on October 1, 1894, and one of which matures on October 1, 1897, heretofore executed by the said Hardenberg and Sherman to the party of the first part; also to release the said Hardenberg and Sherman from the payment of all interest due thereon, and to cancel and discharge a certain chattel mortgage executed by the said David Hardenberg to the said party of the first part, for the purpose of securing the payment of said notes, which said mortgage is now on file and of record in the office of the county recorder of Maricopa county, in the territory of Arizona.

"In witness whereof, the said party of the second part, The Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company, has executed these presents in its corporate name, by its president, and the said party of the first part has executed these presents the day and year first above written."

The following instrument was also executed:

Phoenix, Arizona, Sept. 29, 1894.

To J. M. Ward, Esq.:

The Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company hereby authorizes you to enter upon and take possession of all the property belonging to the Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company, in accordance with and as described in that certain contract entered into by and between the Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company and yourself, bearing date on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1894.

[171] That on receipt of said property you are to turn over to the Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company, at the office of C. F. Ainsworth in Phoenix, Arizona, the notes described in the *contract, and also to cancel the chattel mortgage held by you on the property therein referred to.

The Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Co.,

By C. F. Ainsworth, Its Secretary.

I hereby authorize H. C. Ward as my agent to rec. the above described property for me. J. M. Ward.

All the property mentioned in this agreement was turned over to Ward except, as he claimed, 104 head of cattle. Ward retained possession of the property, and managed it as his own, but did not cancel the mortgage or surrender the notes, insisting that he was entitled to receive the 104 head of cattle or else their value.

On June 12, 1895, he commenced an action in the district court for the county of Maricopa, in which he set forth a copy of the first of the notes, and alleged that there was due thereon the sum of $1,500. At the same time he filed an affidavit for an attachment, in which he averred that the payment of the note was not secured by mortgage or lien upon any real or personal property, or any pledge of personal property, and that the amount due was $1,500. No property was attached and no service of process made until May 6, 1899, and then only on the defendant Sherman, who thereupon filed an answer and counterclaim, which was in the nature of a cross-bill in equity, in which he set up the purchase from Ward, the organization of the company, the transfer to the company of the property purchased and the agreement for the delivery of the property to Ward and the return of the notes and cancellation of the mortgage, and alleged that though the property had been delivered, the notes had not been returned nor the mortgage canceled. He also alleged a transfer by the company to himself of all its rights and claims.

The trial court found the facts as above stated in respect to the original transactions between Ward and defendants, the organization of the company, the transfer to it and by *it to Sherman; and, further, in refer-[172] ence to the transaction between the company and Ward in 1894, it found as follows:

"5. That during the month of September, 1894, and before the maturity of the first note, the Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company attempted to make a settlement with the plaintiff, by agreeing to turn over to him the Sunflower range, all the cattle then on the range, also the desert wells, and other property which it had, which was not included in the mortgage, on condition that said plaintiff turn over and deliver up the two notes aforesaid, with the interest thereon, and cancel and satisfy the mortgage securing the same.

"6. That this contract was never carried out on the part of the plaintiff; but that acting under it he took possession of all the property of the Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company, as aforesaid, on or about October 1, 1894; but never turned over, delivered, or canceled said notes, or either of them, or satisfied or discharged the chattel mortgage securing the same. And that, on the contrary, he brought suit on one of said notes for the collection of a portion that he claimed to be due thereon. At the time he brought this suit on the note maturing October 1, 1894, the other note had not matured."

It thereupon adjudged that Ward was a mortgagee in possession, and, after finding the disposition which he had made of the property, entered a judgment in favor of the defendant Sherman for $17,173.50, and decreed the cancellation of the notes and mortgage.

By § 1 of an act of the territorial assembly (Laws Arizona, 1897, p. 127), it is provided that in a case appealed to the supreme court of the territory the appellant may have the testimony taken in the trial transcribed and certified by the court reporter, and filed with the papers in the case, and that thereupon it shall "become and be a part of the record in said cause;" and be [173]transmitted to the supreme court* of the territory with the other papers in the case. That was done in this case, and part of the record taken to the supreme court of the territory and brought here is the duly certified transcript of the testimony taken on the trial.

Section 2 of that act also provides that it shall not be necessary "to file with the supreme court any transcript, assignment of errors, or other papers except as herein provided." Section 3 requires the plaintiff in error, or appellant, to make an abstract of the record for the benefit of the opposite party and the supreme court. Sections 4 and 5 are as follows:

"Sec. 4. Each party shall prepare and print or typewrite an argument of the points and authorities relied on. The briefs of both sides shall begin with a succinct statement of so much of the record as is essential to the questions discussed in them, referring to the printed abstract by folios and sufficient to dispense with the reading of the printed abstract on the argument. The brief of the plaintiff in error or appellant shall also next contain a distinct enumeration in the form of propositions of the several errors relied on, and all errors not assigned in the printed brief shall be deemed to have been waived. It shall not be necessary to assign or file any assignment of errors in the court below or supreme court, except those assigned in the brief of the plaintiff in error or appellant.

"Sec. 5. All rulings made by the court below in opposition to the plaintiff in error or appellant shall be taken as excepted to by the party appealing or suing out the writ of error, and when assigned as error in the brief shall be reviewed by the supreme court without any bill of exceptions or other assignment of errors except as herein provided."

The record discloses that in the supreme court the appellee moved to strike from the files appellant's abstract of record. No action appears to have been taken upon this motion. The record also discloses that leave was given to the appellant to file a supplemental brief. Neither the original nor the supplemental brief, if one was filed, is before us.

Messrs. A. A. Hoehling, Jr., and A. B. Browne argued the cause, and, with Mr. C. S. Wilson, filed a brief for appellant:

If the contract in plain and unambiguous language makes the observance of an apparently immaterial requirement the condition of a valid contract, neither courts nor juries have the right to disregard it, or to construct, by implication or otherwise, a new contract in the place of that deliberately made by the parties.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 118.

Where the performance of one's duties by the terms of the contract is made a condition precedent, either expressly or by implication, he can only recover by pleading and proving that he has faithfully discharged those duties, or that the other party has waived the performance of them.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 145; Jones v. United States, 96 U. S. 24, 24 L. ed. 644.

Whether performance is made a condition precedent or not, there is demanded, as a prerequisite to a recovery, that the complainant show either a tender of performance, or a readiness or willingness to perform, or that this willingness was rendered ineffectual by conduct of the other party which makes compliance either unnecessary or impossible.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 146, 147; Jones v. United States, 96 U. S. 24, 24 L. ed. 644.

Unreasonable and inexcusable delay, on the part of one seeking rescission of a contract, will be deemed a waiver thereof.

Cummins v. Lods, 1 McCrary, 338, 2 Fed. 661; Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. ed. 798; Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, L. R. 5 P. C. 221.

The rescission of a contract is a remedy to be applied in the sound discretion of the court, and only he is entitled to it who can show that he is without fault, or that the other party is derelict.

Thomas v. McCue, 19 Wash. 287, 53 Pac. 161.

If the appellant's pleading was inartificially drawn, or was deficient in form, it is manifest that his claim is founded upon principles of equity and justice, and his pleading can well be harmonized with that substantial justice which it is plain he is entitled to receive.

The Anne v. United States, 7 Cranch, 570, 3 L. ed. 442.

Mr. Charles F. Ainsworth argued the cause, and, with Mr. L. E. Payson, filed a brief for appellees:

This contract was an entire contract.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 95; Haslack v. Mayers, 26 N. J. L. 284.

A breach of any part of it nullifies the whole contract, and it may be treated by the other party as entirely at an end, and just as if never made.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 150; Cockley v. Brucker, 54 Ohio St. 214, 44 N. E. 559.

Appellant, taking possession of the property, and the contract under which he went into possession being repudiated and abrogated by him, and the parties being in statu quo, was holding the property as a mortgagee in possession, and subject to the liabilities of such a holding.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The supreme court of the territory, without considering the merits of the case, affirmed the judgment on the ground that the assignment of errors was insufficient, citing in its opinion from a rule of practice which had been prescribed by it and in force for many years: "All assignments of errors must distinctly specify each ground of error relied upon, and the particular ruling complained of. . . . An objection to the ruling or action of the court below will be deemed waived here, unless it has been assigned as error, in the manner above provided." [64 Pac. 435.] Undoubtedly the assignment of errors was general in its terms. An application was made to the supreme court for leave to amend the assignment of errors, but it was denied. In a short per curiam opinion, that court, after condemning the assignments as insufficient, said:

"The rules relating to assignments and specifications of error have been so long in force, and we have so often decided that a failure to make proper assignments amounts to a waiver of all errors which are not fundamental, that it would seem there should be no longer occasion for disregard of these plain requirements. In the absence of any assignment of error in this case, and none appearing upon the face of the record, the judgment must be affirmed."

We shall not stop to inquire whether the court erred in refusing to permit an amendment of the assignment of errors, but accepting its conclusion that the failure to make proper assignments is "a waiver of all errors which are not fundamental," and bearing in mind the provisions of § 5 of the statute of 1897, that all rulings made by the court below in opposition to the plaintiff or appellant are to be taken as excepted to, we proceed to inquire whether there was not a fundamental error which should have been [175] corrected by the supreme court. We are of opinion that there was. It may be assumed, as no objection was made on that account, that the counterclaim, which was in its nature a bill in equity for the redemption of the mortgaged property, was properly filed in this action to recover money. Can such a bill be sustained under the circumstances disclosed by the answer? It appears from that answer that the property was turned over to Ward to hold, not as mortgagee, but under a contract by which he was to take the property in satisfaction of the debt, cancel the mortgage, and return the notes. In other words, according to the averments of the answer, a contract of sale was made by the company to Ward, and under the contract of sale Ward took possession. Now, even if it be conceded that Ward's failure to perform was such a breach of the contract as entitled the company to rescind and thereafter to treat Ward as a mortgagee in possession, a bill in equity to enforce such a decision must be presented within a reasonable time. The right to rescind is an affirmative right, asserted by the vendor, the former mortgagor, and, being such, it must be asserted by him within a reasonable time. The answer alleges that on or about October 1, 1895, this agreement was made and the property delivered, but it was not filed until May 16, 1899,—more than three years and a half thereafter. During all that time, Ward was in possession of the property, managing and dealing with it as his own. Can it be that a vendor can wait three years and a half, permit the vendee to deal with the property as his own,—that property being of a value variable from year to year and requiring constant care to make it prosperous,—give his time and labor to its management, take the chances of rise or fall in the market, and then, if it turns out that the business has been prosperous through his efforts, insist, on account of some technical failure, upon a rescission of the contract, and that the party who has been supposing himself the owner, and acting as such, shall be treated as a mortgagee in possession, and held to account for the success of his business efforts? In Pollock's Principles of Contracts, p. 515, the author says:

"The contract must be rescinded within a [176] reasonable time, that is, before the lapse of a time after the true state of things is known, so long that, under the circumstances of the particular case, the other party may fairly infer that the right of rescission is waived."

See also Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 56, 23 L. ed. 799; McLean v. Clapp, 141 U. S. 429, 432, 35 L. ed. 804, 806, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 29.

But was there any ground for the rescission of the contract? There was no fraud, mistake, or false representations. There is no suggestion that the contract was not entered into with full knowledge or that it was unfair in any of its details. The complaint merely is that Ward was guilty of a breach of one of its stipulations. If so, the company was entitled to damages for that breach, but no damages are shown. The company paid nothing; has lost nothing. So far as disclosed it went out of business, and therefore the failure to release the mortgage could not have injured its business credit.

But whatever may be the rights, other than a simple claim of damages for breach of contract, possessed by the company and transferred by it to the defendant Sherman, they are equitable in their nature, and in respect to them the general doctrine of laches applies. We have often had occasion to consider the question of laches. In Gallagher v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 368, 373, 36 L. ed. 738, 740, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 873, and Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Austin, 168 U. S. 685, 42 L. ed. 626, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 223, are collected the decisions of the court. In the former of these cases it is said (p. 372, L. ed. p. 740, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 874):

"They [the adjudicated cases] proceed on the assumption that the party to whom laches is imputed has knowledge of his rights and an ample opportunity to establish them in the proper forum; that by reason of his delay the adverse party has good reason to believe that the alleged rights are worthless or have been abandoned; and that, because of the change in condition or relations during this period of delay, it would be an injustice to the latter to permit him to now assert them."

[177] "But it is unnecessary to multiply cases. They all proceed upon the theory that laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time; but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced,—an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relations of the property or the parties."

And in the last case (p. 698, L. ed. p. 631, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 228):

"The reason upon which the rule is based is not alone the lapse of time during which the neglect to enforce the right has existed, but the changes of condition which may have arisen during the period in which there has been neglect. In other words, where a court of equity finds that the position of the parties has so changed that equitable relief cannot be afforded without doing injustice, or that the intervening rights of third persons may be destroyed or seriously impaired, it will not exert its equitable powers in order to save one from the consequences of his own neglect."

Apply these considerations to the case at bar. The property was turned over on a contract of sale. Ward was left in possession for over three years and a half without a suggestion of any claim that he was only a mortgagee in possession. He had a right to believe that he was the owner. If the contract had not been made he could have foreclosed his mortgage and acquired title by sale under foreclosure proceedings. He dealt with the property as his own. He gave his time, skill, and labor to the work of caring for it. It is impossible to replace the parties in the situation they were in at the time the contract was made. It would be grossly inequitable to deprive him of the benefit of his time, skill, and labor, and give it to the mortgagor, who all those years did nothing and gave no notice of any question of the completeness of Ward's title. It seems to us that the doctrine of laches applies with force, and that upon the pleadings the court should have adjudged the defendant not entitled either to a rescission of the contract or to hold the vendee as a mortgagee in possession.

If we look beyond the pleadings to the testimony (and that, as we have seen, was, by virtue of the statute, made a part of the *rec-[178] ord of the case in the supreme court), the error of the trial court is even more apparent.

The agreement of September 12 provided for the transfer and conveyance of all cattle on the Sunflower range, branded with the named brands, "excepting only from the provision of said conveyance such cattle as shall have been sold and delivered by said Sherman-Hardenberg Cattle Company prior or to September 1, 1894, it being understood that all stock cattle which may have been sold subsequent to September 1, 1894, shall be accounted for by the party of the second part to said party of the first part." By this all the cattle belonging to the company on September 1 were to be transferred to the plaintiff, and if any of such cattle had been sold subsequently to September 1 they were to be accounted for by the company to the plaintiff. Further, the agreement stipulated for the delivery and cancelation of the notes and mortgage "in consideration of the said party of the second part conveying to said party of the first part all of the property hereinbefore described within thirty days from the date hereof, and delivering possession of the same to said party of the first part or his authorized agent, in said county of Maricopa aforesaid." By the undisputed testimony two lots of cattle, one of 69 or 70 head and the other of 34 or 35 head, were sold and delivered by the company to other parties than the plaintiff after the 1st of September. Therefore the company was to account for those cattle so sold and delivered, and the duty resting upon Ward to surrender and cancel the notes and mortgage was conditioned upon the delivery within the county of the property described within thirty days from September 12. In short, the terms of the contract were clear. Ward performed all that he was under obligations to perform. The default was on the part of the company. Ward took possession of the property delivered, managed it successfully for several years, and still the court held that the defaulting party could take advantage of its own default, appropriate the entire profits of Ward's care and ability, and upon that basis adjudged [179] against Ward the *return of all the property then in his possession and the payment of over $17,000. But it is said that Ward himself repudiated the agreement because he brought suit on the first of the notes. There may have been a technical mistake in the form of the action, but there was no repudiation of the agreement, as is shown by the fact that the complaint only asked judgment for $1,500, and that Ward filed with the complaint an affidavit for an attachment, in which he averred that the payment of the sum due was "not secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property or any pledge of personal property." But equity will not destroy rights on account of a mere technical mistake of counsel. It may be conceded that Ward should have brought an action in form for the value of the cattle not delivered, but it is manifest that that value was all that he was seeking to recover.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Arizona is reversed and the case remanded to that court with instructions to reverse the judgment of the District Court, and remand the case to that court for further proceedings in conformity to the views herein expressed.

IN ERROR to the St. Louis Court of Appeals of the State of Missouri to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiff in an action in replevin to recover a consignment from a carrier. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 89 Mo. App. 437.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On June 25, 1895, Charles E. Pearce, the testator of the defendants in error, commenced his action in replevin in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, to recover from the railroad company four boxes of curios. After answer a trial was had before the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff, which, on May 7, 1901, was affirmed by the St. Louis court of appeals. 89 Mo. App. 437. An application to transfer the case to the supreme court of the state on the ground that it involved the validity of a statute of, or authority exercised under, the United States, was denied (State ex rel. Wabash R. Co. v. Bland, 168 Mo. 1, 67 S. W. 580), and thereupon it was brought here on writ of error.

The facts are undisputed, and are as follows: Pearce was the owner of the curios, and in Yokohama, Japan, shipped them to St. Louis. The bill of lading was issued by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and recited that the goods were shipped upon the company's steamer, Empress of India, to be carried to Vancouver, British Columbia, and thence over the Canadian Pacific and connecting lines to St. Louis, Missouri.

The boxes were carried to Vancouver and thence by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company over its own and a connecting line controlled by it to St. Paul, Minnesota. Upon arrival at St. Paul the custom officers took possession of the boxes, opened and examined the contents, and duly assessed the duties thereon at $264.31, which sum was paid by the railway company, and had to be paid in order to regain possession and forward the goods. The goods were thereafter delivered to the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, by it to the defendant at Given, Iowa, and by the latter carried to St. Louis. The inspection at St. Paul was in strict accordance with the laws of the United States, and the duties exacted were properly chargeable upon the goods. When the defendant received the goods from the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company it became responsible under its traffic agreements for the payment of the charges then on the goods, including the custom duties, and has since paid those charges. On receipt of the goods in St. Louis they were tendered to the plaintiff upon payment of the charges. The goods were shipped in bond to St. Louis, and this was so marked on the boxes. If they had been transported to St. Louis in bond, as they should have been, they would there have been opened and examined and retained in the custody and possession of the custom officers, not only during examination and inspection, but also until the duties were paid.

Mr. Wells H. Blodgett submitted the cause for plaintiff in error. Mr. George S. Grover was with him on the brief:

The government of the United States had, until the payment was made to it, a prior and paramount lien on the goods for the duties.

Overton, Liens, § 656, p. 709; Hodges v. Harris, 6 Pick. 360.

The plaintiff in error has, also, a valid lien on the goods in question for the charges advanced by it to its connecting line, in the usual course of business.

Under the contract of shipment in evidence, the plaintiff in error is not responsible for the injury and loss here claimed, as it is conceded that such injury and loss occurred beyond its own line.

Mr. Edward C. Kehr submitted the cause for defendants in error:

The question was adjudicated between the parties by the supreme court of Missouri.

State ex rel. Wabash R. Co. v. Bland, 168 Mo. 1, 67 S. W. 580.

The Supreme Court of the United States is bound by the decision of the state court in regard to the meaning of the Constitution and laws of its own state, and its decision upon such a state of facts raises no Federal question.

Turner v. Wilkes County, 173 U. S. 461, 43 L. ed. 768, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464; Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 40 L. ed. 91, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80.

To give the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction over the judgment of a state court, it must appear that the decision of a Federal question presented to that court was necessary to the determination of the cause, and that it was actually decided, or that, without deciding it, the judgment rendered could not have been given.

Brown v. Atwell, 92 U. S. 327, 23 L. ed. 511; Citizens' Bank v. Board of Liquidation, 98 U. S. 140, 25 L. ed. 114; De Saussure v. Gaillard, 127 U. S. 234, 32 L. ed. 132, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1053; Blount v. Walker, 134 U. S. 607, 33 L. ed. 1036, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606; Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Morgan, 160 U. S. 288, 40 L. ed. 430, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 276; Sawyer v. Piper, 189 U. S. 154, 47 L. ed. 757, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633.

Where the supreme court of a state decides a Federal question in rendering a judgment, and also decides against the plaintiff in error on an independent ground not involving a Federal question and broad enough to maintain the judgment, the writ of error will be dismissed.

The carrier had no right to change the contract destination of said goods, nor to change their consignment from Schade & Co., St. Louis, to F. Jones, St. Paul, nor to do otherwise than to carry said goods "in bond" to St. Louis.

Mellier v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co. 14 Mo. App. 281.

The freight was prepaid to St. Louis. The carrier therefore has no freight lien on the goods. The money advanced in payment of the duties is no part of the cost of transportation, and the carrier acquired no lien on the goods by paying them.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions are presented,—one of jurisdiction and the other on the merits.

With regard to the first, the decision of the supreme court of the state is not controlling. It is not the province of a state court to determine our jurisdiction; and further, the Missouri statute, providing for a review of certain cases by the supreme court, is not identical with but more limited than § 709, Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 575), which prescribes our jurisdiction over final judgments of state courts.

It is contended that the only question determined by the state court was the applicability of the equitable doctrine of subrogation; that no statute of Congress was suggested giving a right of subrogation in cases like this, and therefore that the decision of the state court rested upon a matter of general law. But the answer of the defendant, [185] after stating the circumstances of the payment by the several carriers, alleged that it was "entitled to the first lien on said goods under the laws of the United States for the amount of said duties. Although no single statute was mentioned, it claimed a lien on the goods under and by virtue of the laws of the United States, and thus directly 192 U. S.

called for a determination of a Federal right. Crowell v. Randell, 10 Pet. 368, 9 L. ed. 458; Proprietors of Bridges v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 1 Wall. 116-142, 17 L. ed. 571-576; Furman v. Nichol, 8 Wall. 44, 56, 19 L. ed. 370, 376; Dooley v. Smith, 13 Wall. 604, 20 L. ed. 547. The question in fact presented and decided was not simply the scope and applicability of the doctrine of subrogation, but rather to what extent, considering the obligations cast by the revenue laws and the duties of common carriers as between themselves and the shipper, the carrier was protected by the laws of the United States in paying custom duties exacted under them. When we stop to consider the great volume of imports handled almost exclusively by common carriers, the owners or consignees being often in the interior of the country, this is obviously a question of supreme importance. And this question is solved not alone upon general principles of law, but involves an inquiry as to the effect of exactions made under authority of the statutes of the United States. We are, by § 709, Rev. Stat. given jurisdiction over the final judgments of state courts "where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of, or commission held or authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or immunity specially set up or claimed." The contention of the railroad company is that payment of duties exacted under the statutes of the United States does not operate simply to release the goods, but also gives, in cases like the present, to the carrier, the right and privilege of maintaining possession until it is reimbursed these duties. Is the statute to be considered simply as a demand for money, or does it also carry a grant to one situated as this carrier, of a right and privilege of possession? This right and privilege was specially set up and claimed by the railroad [186] company. Whether it existed was the substantial question presented and decided. And, whether rightly or wrongly decided, the presentation of the question, the claim of the right and privilege, was, when denied by the state court, sufficient to give this court jurisdiction.

We pass, therefore, to consider the merits. Do the laws of the United States exacting the payment of duties at ports of entry justify the carrier in paying those duties, and give to it a lien therefor as against the owner? It must be remembered that the government has not prescribed payment simply at the place of delivery, but has named the ports of entry at which, and at which only, payment can be made. Must the carrier insist that the owner shall be present at the place of entry to himself make payment, or, after notifying the owner, leave the goods in the hands of the government officials to be held for the charges thereon, or, may the carrier pay the charges, and maintain possession until reimbursed by the owner? It is unnecessary to consider what rights would exist if it were alleged that the goods imported were free from duty, or that there had been overcharges or wrongful conduct on the part of the government officials. Here the regularity of the proceedings on the part of the government officials and the correct amount of the duties collected are unquestioned.

We are of opinion that the custom laws of the United States are potent to fully protect the carrier in the payment of the legal duties charged upon goods in its possession. In order to fully understand the force and scope of any statute or body of statutes we must have regard to the conditions and circumstances for which the legislation was intended and under which it is to become operative. We are not narrowly to read the letter and ignore the state of affairs to which that legislation was intended and is applicable. As we have said, the great body of imports is subject to duties, and payment thereof is, by statute, specifically required to be made at certain places. These imports are brought in by carriers, and distributed by them to the several places of destination.

[187] *It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the proposition that it is the common-law duty of the carrier to receive, carry, and deliver goods; that by virtue of this obligation it is entitled to retain possession until its charges are paid. Nor is this lien confined to the charges for its own transportation. The law is thus stated in Overton on Liens, § 135, p. 166:

"The lien attaches not alone for the particular item of charge for carriage due upon the goods, but for such other legal charges as the carrier, in the course of his duty, may have been compelled to expend upon their care, custody, and preservation. As when a railway, in the transportation of live stock, as cattle, horses, and swine, has been at expense of labor and money in feeding and preserving them, such expense is a legitimate charge in addition to their transportation. For the carrier is under special obligation to guard and protect such property, hence the propriety of a lien for such extraordinary expense and care. If a carrier, in the ordinary course of the business, pay back charges upon goods due to another carrier in the course of transportation, as they come to him, he may recover for such back charges and freight so paid; and the owner may seek his remedy for any damages done them against the party in whose hands it was done, or under his original contract of shipment."

See also Hutchinson, Carr. § 478a; Ray, Freight Carr. § 102. In Schouler on Bailments, p. 544, it is said:

"A common carrier, then, may usually retain particular goods, by virtue of his lien right, until the freight and charges due thereon for his whole transportation are paid or tendered him, and he cannot be compelled to give them up sooner. This lien, moreover, extends to all the proper freight and storage charges upon the goods throughout the whole of a continuous transit over successive lines; since the last carrier or final warehouseman may advance what was lawfully due his predecessors, and hold the property as security for his reimbursement."

In making payment to a connecting carrier of its freight *charges the carrier is not [188] a mere volunteer, such as is referred to in Etna L. Ins. Co. v. Middleport, 124 U. S. 534, 31 L. ed. 537, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

All this was matter of common knowledge, and upon this the legislation in respect to duties was enacted. Is it to be supposed that Congress intended that protection to the carrier should depend upon the perhaps varying opinions of the courts of the different states as to whether, in making payment, the carrier was a mere volunteer, or whether it can be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the nation? It must be remembered that the importation of goods is a subject of national, and not of state, regulation, that such power of regulation continues until the final delivery of the imported articles, so that over the entire transportation of these goods to St. Louis, the place of delivery, the power of Congress was supreme and exclusive. It must also be remembered that bonded goods are, by § 2993, Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1962), deliverable only to carriers designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, who are made responsible to the United States, and are required to give bond to the United States in such form and amount and with such conditions and security as the Secretary of the Treasury shall require. Is it not reasonable to hold that Congress,—having in mind the duty of carriers in reference to transportation and delivery, their customary lien for charges, and their right to retain possession during transit,—in directing the custom house officers to take goods out of a carrier's possession, inspect and hold until the duties are paid, intended that, upon payment, the government lien should pass to the carrier, with a view of enabling it to discharge its duty of carriage and delivery to the consignee? It was not necessary to specifically state that the government's lien was transferred, for when Congress provided by statute for interrupting the carrier's common-law right of possession, it is implied that the action necessarily taken by the carrier to regain possession shall work no injury to the rights which flow from possession. Such, it seems to us, is the fair import of this legislation, [189] enacted, as it was, in view of the *well-recognized rights and duties of carriers. The defendant should not, therefore, have been deprived of the possession of the goods without a repayment of the duties.

It is insisted, however, that the goods were shipped in bond to St. Louis, that the Canadian Pacific for its own convenience wrongfully changed their bonded destination to the port of St. Paul, and that during the examination and inspection at St. Paul some of the curios were broken, and some lost, whereas if they had been shipped in bond to St. Louis they might have been opened and examined in the presence of the plaintiff, and injury and loss prevented. Conceding this, and that the Canadian Pacific by its wrongful act was liable for the injuries resulting to the plaintiff, the contract of shipment stipulated that each of the parties employed in the carriage should be liable only for loss or damage accruing upon its own road, and that such carriers should not be jointly liable, nor either for any loss or damage accruing upon the road of the other; so that whatever claim the plaintiff may have had for such injury and loss was only against the Canadian Pacific, and could not operate to prevent the defendant company from receiving that which, by its payment, it was entitled to.

The judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals is reversed and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Constitutional law—pure food legislation as affected by commerce clause.

1. The prohibition against the sale within the state of adulterated food products which is made by N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 661, § 41, does not, as applied to food products imported into the United States through the channels of foreign commerce, violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, but is a valid exercise of the police power of the state to legislate for the benefit of its people in the prevention of deception and fraud.

2. A contract made in New York by residents thereof for the sale to residents of another state of coffee to be shipped from Rio Janeiro to New York city by a designated steamer, the buyers to have free storage and fire insurance for the first month after the arrival of the steamer, and the storage of the coffee in New York,—is a New York contract, and as such is governed by the prohibition made by N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 661, § 41, against the sale within the state of adulterated food products.
3. The enactment by Congress of the prohibition contained in the act of August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 414, chap. 839, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3185), § 2, against the importation of any adulterated or unwholesome food or drug, or any liquors, adulterated or mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical, did not have the effect of rendering inoperative as regards food products imported into the United States through the channels of foreign commerce the provision of N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 661, § 41, prohibiting the sale within the state of adulterated food products, enacted in the exercise of the police power of the state, to prevent deception and fraud.
4. The exclusion of evidence of a demand in some portions of the United States for artificially colored coffee, on the issue whether such coffee was adulterated within the prohibition of N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 661, § 41, against the sale within the state of adulterated food products, will not require a reversal of the judgment of a state court on writ of error from the United States Supreme Court, on the theory that the effect of such evidence would have been to show that coffee artificially colored as a means of fraud and deception was a recognized article of commerce, the right to deal in which was protected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederic R. Kellogg argued the cause, and, with Mr. Arthur J. Baldwin and Messrs. Dill & Baldwin, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The universally recognized basis of the police power of a state is the right to protect the health, morals, safety, and property of its citizens.

As Congress has, in the exercise of its power, enacted legislation as to the importation of adulterated foods pursuant to the terms of which the coffees in question were not adulterated and were properly imported into the United States, and as these coffees had been inspected and admitted into the United States by the United States officials, a state statute in effect prohibiting the delivery of such coffees in the original packages in which they were imported is unconstitutional and void.

Mr. Charles Stewart Davison argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

The line of demarcation between the reserved police powers of the state in relation to inspecting and prohibiting dealings in that which would be injurious to the public health or morals, or was designed to cheat or defraud, and those matters which fall within the regulation of commerce with foreign countries and between the states, is clear, and has been defined by this court on several occasions.

Can it be that the Constitution of the United States secures to anyone the privilege of manufacturing and selling an article of food in such a manner as to induce the mass of the people to believe that they are buying something which, in fact, is wholly different from that which is offered for sale? Does the freedom of commerce among the states demand recognition of the right to practise a deception upon the people in the sale of any articles, even those that may have become the subject of trade in different parts of the country?

It may be safely assumed that a yellow oxide of iron is a noxious chemical,—at least sufficiently so to prevent its being either a desirable adjunct to coffee, or its having been intended to be affirmatively permitted by Congress as an adulterant for coffee.

People v. Girard, 145 N. Y. 105, 45 Am. St. Rep. 595, 39 N. E. 823.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The law of the state of New York contained the following:

Sec. 41. Adulterations.—No person shall, within the state, manufacture, produce, compound, brew, distill, have, sell, or offer for sale any adulterated food or drug. An article shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this act, . . . in the case of food, . . . (6) if it be colored or coated, or polished or powdered, whereby damage is concealed, or it is made to appear better than it really is or of greater value." (Laws of the state of New York of 1893, ch. 661, § 41, being chapter 25 of the General Laws of the state of New York.)

With these provisions in force, in July, 1894, the firm of Crossman & Brothers, hereafter referred to as the sellers, residents of New York city, by contract made in New York, sold to the firm of Theodore G. Lurman & Company, hereafter referred to as the buyers, residents of Baltimore, five hundred bags of Rio coffee, one half the bags to be No. 8 grade and the other half No. 9 grade. It was stipulated that the coffee was to be shipped from Rio Janeiro to New York city by a designated steamer, the coffee to be sound or to be made sound by the sellers. The grades 8 and 9 referred to in the memorandum of sale were standard types, bearing those numbers, established by the Coffee Exchange of the city of New York, and it was agreed that the coffee was to be of the average of such types, and differences arising on the subject were to be determined by a "grader," to be selected by each of the parties, the two to select a third in the event of a disagreement, his decision to be conclusive. It was stipulated that on the arrival of the steamer and the storage of the coffee in New York the buyers were to have the advantage of the first month's storage and fire insurance, free of expense.

[194] *In due time the named steamer reached the port of New York, and the five hundred bags of coffee were stored and delivery tendered in New York city to the buyers. Some of the coffee was accepted and the remainder was rejected, on the ground that it was adulterated, because it had been artificially colored by coating the beans with a yellow wash. Without going into the details of what transpired between the parties as a result of the refusal to accept the coffee, it suffices, for this case, to say that ultimately the graders provided for in the contract were named, and on their disagreement a third was selected, who decided that, although the coffee had been coated with the wash, its average quality was yet equal to the specified types of the Coffee Exchange referred to in the contract. The buyers refused to abide by this finding, and to accept delivery and pay for the adulterated coffee. The sellers then disposed of the coffee for account of the buyers, and commenced this suit to recover the difference between the amount produced by the alleged sale and the contract price. During the course of the litigation two trials were had, and the cause was twice passed on by the appellate division of the supreme court in and for the first judicial department. On the first hearing in the supreme court it was held, in accord with a decision of the court of appeals of the state of New York, rendered in a collateral controversy which grew out of the refusal to accept the coffee (Re Lurman, 149 N. Y. 588, 44 N. E. 1125), that if the coffee was adulterated, within the statute of the state of New York, the buyers were not bound to accept, despite the finding of the grader that it conformed to the types of the Coffee Exchange, referred to in the contract. Finally, all incidental questions being eliminated, the cause was tried on the distinct issue whether the coffee was adulterated within the provisions of the statute. There was a verdict and judgment for the buyers, which was affirmed by the appellate division of the supreme court in and for the first judicial department. The cause having been then taken to the court of appeals of the state of New York, the court affirmed the *judgment of the supreme court, and re-[195] mitted the record to that court. 171 N. Y. 329, 63 N. E. 1097. Because of such remittitur this writ of error to the supreme court is prosecuted to review the judgment of the court of appeals.

Concerning the facts of the case the court of appeals said (p. 335, N. E. p. 1100):

"The coffee tendered by the plaintiffs, which was rejected, was of a low grade, containing many poor, withered, and black beans. It, confessedly, was colored and the beans coated with a yellowish substance. It is not contended that the coloring matter improved the taste or added to the value of the coffee. It is claimed that the only purpose of the coloring was to hide the character of the poor beans and to make them appear of the same character as the good coffee. The jury has found by its verdict that it was so colored as to conceal the damaged portions, or made it to appear better than it really was, or of greater value to the ordinary, untrained observer. In other words, that it was adulterated for the purposes of fraud and deception."

Applying the provisions of the health laws of the state of New York concerning the adulteration of food products already referred to, it was decided that the court below had correctly held that there was no obligation on the part of the buyer to take delivery and pay for the coffee if fraudulently colored in violation of the prohibitions of the statute. Coming to consider the contention of the sellers, that the provision of the law of the state in question was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, the court of appeals said (p. 332, N. E. p. 1098) :

"The states have no power to regulate commerce with foreign countries or with each other. This power has been delegated to the Congress of the United States, and that body can, by law, determine what shall or shall not be permitted to be imported. With the right of importation follows the right of sale in original packages, and therefore the states cannot prohibit the sale of articles of commerce within their borders.

[196] *The states cannot, under the guise of inspection, or under their reserved police powers, prohibit the importation into their jurisdictions of sound meat, under the pretense that it may be damaged or decayed, or Texas cattle for fear they may be diseased, or spirituous or malt liquors for fear that they may intoxicate, or oleomargarine for fear it may be adulterated. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681; Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 49, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757.

Having thus fully conceded the plenary operation of the Constitution of the United States upon interstate and foreign commerce, the court proceeded to decide that the statute of the state of New York which it upheld was not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution, because the state, in its enactment, but exerted its reserved police power to legislate for the protection of the health and safety of the community, and to provide against deception or fraud. In support of this theory the court cited from the decisions of this court, to which it had referred, as showing the general rule, and additionally fortified its conclusion by reference to, and citations from, the opinion of this court in Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 590, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 154.

All but three of the many propositions embraced in the assignment of errors and urged at bar rest on the contention that the court of appeals misconceived the extent of the police power of the state, and therefore erroneously decided that the law of the state of New York which was applied to the case was not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. We shall not at any length undertake to review the argument made at bar to sustain this proposition, since its unsoundness will be more fully demonstrated by a mere reference to the previous decisions of this court, upon which the court below based its conclusions. Indeed, every contention here urged to show that the law of New York is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States was fully and expressly considered and negated by the decision of this court in Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 590, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 154. In that case a law of the *state of Massachusetts forbidding the [197] sale of oleomargarine which was artificially colored was applied to a sale in Massachusetts of an original package of that article which had been manufactured in, and shipped from, the state of Illinois. In the course of a full review of the previous cases relating to the subject it was said (p. 472, L. ed. p. 227, Inters. Com. Rep. p. 600, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 158) :

"If there be any subject over which it would seem the states ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the general government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally, affect trade in such products transported from one state to another state. But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states. For, as said by this court in Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 103, 23 L. ed. 819, 820: 'In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce, it was never intended to cut the states off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution. . . . And it may be said, generally, that the legislation of a state, not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit.'"

Again, it was said (p. 478, L. ed. p. 229, Inters. Com. Rep. p. 606, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 160):

[198] "And yet it is supposed that the owners of a compound which has been put in a condition to cheat the public into believing that it is a particular article of food in daily use and eagerly sought by people in every condition of life are protected *by the Constitution in making a sale of it against the will of the state in which it is offered for sale, because of the circumstance that it is an original package, and has become a subject of ordinary traffic. We are unwilling to accept this view. We are of opinion that it is within the power of a state to exclude from its markets any compound manufactured in another state, which has been artificially colored or adulterated so as to cause it to look like an article of food in general use, and the sale of which may, by reason of such coloration or adulteration, cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy. The Constitution of the United States does not secure to any one the privilege of defrauding the public."

The assertion that the statute of the state of New York which the court below applied is repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States being thus shown to be devoid of merit, there remains only to be considered the three propositions to which we have previously adverted. We shall briefly consider and dispose of them.

1st. It is insisted that, even although it was in the power of the state of New York to legislate for the prevention of fraud and deception by forbidding the sale of the adulterated food products, such prohibition could only operate upon contracts made within, or intended to be executed within, the state, and as the contract here in controversy was not of such character, therefore the law of the state of New York was erroneously held to control. This proposition is based on the assumption that because the buyers of the coffee were residents of Maryland, therefore the contract must be treated as having been made for the purpose of securing the shipment of the coffee from Rio Janeiro to the residence of the buyers, hence the city of New York was referred to in the contract merely as the port of entry. It is insisted, per contra, that this proposition was not relied upon at the trial, nor called to the attention of the court of appeals of the state of New York, and should not be now considered, because if it had been raised below

[199] it would *have been met by proof showing that the buyers, although residents in Maryland, were engaged in carrying on a business for the sale of coffee in New York city. The suggestion that the proposition was not made below is borne out by the fact that it was not referred to by the court of appeals of the state of New York or in the several opinions handed down by the supreme court of the state of New York during the course of the protracted litigation which the cause has engendered. Be this as it may, however, we think the proposition is devoid of merit. The contract of sale was made in New York; the storage and delivery in the city of New York was therein provided for. It was clearly, therefore, a New York contract, and governed by the law of New York.

2d. It is urged that, even although there was power in the state of New York to legislate on the subject of adulteration of food, such legislation ceased to be operative as regards food products imported into the United States through the channels of foreign commerce after the passage of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, "providing for the inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases." 26 Stat. at L. 414, chap. 839 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3185). The second section of that act, it is insisted, does not exclude from importation adulterated food, but simply adulterated food which is mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical, drug, or other ingredient injurious to health, which, it is urged, was not the case with the coffee in question. The language of the section upon which this contention is based is as follows:

"That it shall be unlawful to import into the United States any adulterated or unwholesome food or drug, or any vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors, adulterated or mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical, drug, or other ingredient injurious to health."

We think it unnecessary to determine whether the statute lends even color to the proposition, since we think it is clear that its effect, whatever be its import, was not to deprive the *state of its police power to [200] legislate for the benefit of its people in the prevention of deception and fraud, and thus to control sales made within the state of articles so adulterated as to come within the valid prohibitions of the state statute.

3d. In the trial court the plaintiff tendered evidence to demonstrate that there was a demand in some portions of the country for artificially colored coffee, and, to the ruling of the court excluding such testimony as irrelevant, exception was saved. Although the court of appeals, in its opinion, did not make any special reference to the subject, it is insisted that the question was called to its attention, and that, in affirming the judgment, it in effect sustained the action of the trial court in excluding the testimony, and thereby deprived the plaintiff of rights secured under the Constitution of the United States. The effect of the evidence, it is argued, had it been admitted, would have been to show that coffee artificially colored as a means of fraud and deception was a recognized article of commerce, and therefore the right to deal in it was protected by the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and such dealings could not, therefore, be controlled by the state law. To state the proposition we think is to answer it.

It, moreover, is disposed of by the decisions of this court to which we have previously referred. Besides, the question which the case involved was the right of the sellers to contract for and deliver in the state of New York an article so adulterated and fraudulent as to be within the prohibitions of the law of New York. Further, the proof tending to show that coffee so adulterated and artificially colored as to be the convenient means of accomplishing fraud and deceit was in demand in some places outside of the state of New York could have no legitimate tendency to cause the adulterated and fraudulently deceptive article to become legitimate commerce.

Affirmed.

EAN JOAQUIN & KING'S RIVER CANAL & IRRIGATION COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 201-217.)

Water rates — contract exemption from reduction — reserved power to amend or repeal — due process of law — equal protection of the laws.

1. No contract that the state would not thereafter authorize boards of supervisors to reduce water rates so as to yield to the stockholders less than 1½ per cent per month on the capital actually invested by a corporation organized under Cal. Stat. 1853, p. 87, as amended by Cal. Stat. 1862, p. 540, was created by the provision of § 3 of the latter act, that every such company should have power to establish its rates, which should be subject to regulation by the appropriate board of supervisors, but should not be reduced by them below that point.

2. Assuming that a contract exemption from the reduction by a board of supervisors of water rates below a certain point was created in favor of the company organized under Cal. Stat. 1853, p. 87, as amended by Cal. Stat. 1862, p. 540, by the provisions of § 3 of the latter act, the legislature, in the exercise of its reserved power to alter or repeal, conferred by Cal. Const. 1849, art. 4, § 31, still could enact the provisions of Cal. Stat. 1885, p. 95, § 5, authorizing the supervisors to reduce the rates to not less than 6 nor more than 18 per cent upon the then value of the property actually used in supplying water to the public.

3. The reduction of water rates by a board of supervisors acting under the authority of Cal. Stat. 1885, p. 95, § 5, so as to give an annual income of 6 per cent upon the then value of the property of the water company actually used in supplying water to the public, does not necessarily amount to a taking of property without due process of law, or a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a decree setting aside an ordinance regulating water rates. Reversed and the bill ordered dismissed without prejudice.

See same case below, 113 Fed. 930.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The county above named has appealed directly to this court from a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California, setting aside an ordinance adopted by the board of supervisors of Stanislaus county on June 24, 1896, designating the water rates which were to be charged by the company (appellee) to its water consumers for *the ensuing [202] year. The appeal here is on the ground that the case involved the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States, under § 5 of the act of 1891. (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 549.)

The company was incorporated in 1871, under an act of the California legislature approved in 1853 (Stat. of 1853, p. 87), as amended in 1862 (Stat. of 1862, p. 540). After its incorporation and the obtaining of the necessary land, the company built a canal or reservoir at a cost, as alleged, of about a million dollars, and it is averred that the property was and is of that value. Subsequently to the completion of its works the company furnished water for irrigating purposes to its customers at rates fixed by it, which were not interfered with by the board of supervisors up to the time of the adoption of the above-mentioned ordinance of June 24, 1896. Soon afterwards the company commenced this suit for the purpose of obtaining a decree setting the ordinance aside and declaring it to be null and void, and decreeing that the company was entitled to have the rates for supplying its water to its customers and the users thereof generally so fixed that they would in the aggregate furnish a reasonable and just compensation for the services rendered, and a fair, just, and equitable return therefor.

The act of 1862 provided in § 3 as follows:

"Every company organized as aforesaid shall have power, and the same is hereby granted, . . . to establish, collect, and receive rates, water rents, or tolls, which shall be subject to regulation by the board of supervisors of the county or counties in which the work is situated, but which shall not be reduced by the supervisors so low as to yield to the stockholders less than 1½ per cent per month upon the capital actually invested." [Cal. Gen. Laws, 1850-1864, par. 978.]

[203] On March 12, 1885, the legislature passed an act (Cal. Stat. 1885, page 95) providing for the fixing, by the board of supervisors of a county, of the rates to be collected by water companies. Section 5 of that act authorized the various boards of supervisors in the state to regulate and control the water *rates that might be charged in their respective counties by any person, company, association, or corporation, and provided:

"Said boards of supervisors, in fixing such rates, shall, as near as may be, so adjust them that the net annual receipts and profits thereof to the said persons, companies, associations, and corporations so furnishing such water to such inhabitants shall be not less than 6 nor more than 18 per cent upon the said value of the canals, ditches, flumes, chutes, and all other property actually used and useful to the appropriation and furnishing of such water of each of such persons, companies, associations, and corporations; but in estimating such net receipts and profits the cost of any extensions, enlargements, or other permanent improvements of such water rights or water-works shall not be included as part of the said expenses of management, repairs, and operating of such works, but when accomplished may and shall be included in the present cost and cash value of such work. In fixing said rates, within the limits aforesaid, at which water shall be so furnished as to each of such persons, companies, associations, and corporations, each of said boards of supervisors may likewise take into estimation any and all other facts, circumstances, and conditions pertinent thereto, to the end and purpose that said rates shall be equal, reasonable, and just, both to such persons, companies, associations, and corporations and to said inhabitants." [Decreeing's Anno. Codes & Stat. p. 140.]

The complainant alleges in its bill that prior to March 12, 1885, at the time of the passage of the act of that date, the company and its incorporators had actually invested under the authority of the act of 1862 a capital amounting to $971,113.13 in money, all of which was actually, reasonably, and necessarily expended by the complainant in the purchase and construction of its canals and other property actually used in and useful to the appropriation and furnishing of the water, and that the property was, on the last-named date, and still is, of the reasonable worth of $971,113.13. The complainant averred that if the act of 1885 was construed as repealing, *altering, or amend-[204] ing the provisions of the act of 1862, as to rates to be charged by the company, then that the act of 1885 was in violation of, and repugnant to, the provisions of article I., § 10, of the Constitution of the United States, and, as thus construed, the act of 1885 impaired the obligation of the contract between the state of California and the complainant, entered into under the authority of § 3 of the act of 1862.

It was also averred that the rates, as fixed by the board under the act of 1885, would result in taking the property of the complainant without due process of law, and in depriving it of the equal protection of the laws.

An answer was put in, taking issue with the complainant on the averments in its bill, and a trial was had in the circuit court. That court held (113 Fed. 930) that there was a contract under the act of 1862, as contended for by the complainant; that the act of 1885 could not be so construed as to permit the board of supervisors, in fixing water rates by its authority, to entirely disregard the capital actually invested in the property of the corporation under the act of 1862, and that if otherwise construed the act of 1885 would run counter to the constitutional provision that no law impairing the obligation of a contract should be passed, and the statute would be subjected to the further objection that, as so construed, the state would deprive complainant of its property without due process of law, and would also deny to it the equal protection of the laws, as provided for in the Federal Constitution, and that such provision could not be held subordinate to the constitutional power conferred upon the state legislature to alter, amend, or repeal the general laws concerning corporations. It was also said by the court that it was the duty of the board of supervisors to ascertain the amount of the capital actually invested in the corporation, that is to say, the amount of capital actually paid in and invested in constructing the canals and acquiring the other property used and made useful in supplying water to the customers of the corporation in Stanislaus county, and this fact should have been considered by the [205]*board in fixing the water rates which the complainant was entitled to charge under the statute; that when the board of supervisors fixed the rates no consideration was given by it to the evidence showing the amount of the capital actually put into the corporation, or the actual, reasonable, and proper cost of the works; that the evidence establishes the fact that the board failed to perform its duty in this respect, and that by reason thereof it deprived the complainant of its property without due process of law, and denied to it the equal protection of the laws.

The court found that the evidence showed that the rate fixed by the board of supervisors reduced the income of the company considerably below 6 per cent upon the capital actually invested in the property of the corporation, and if a corresponding reduction were made in Fresno and Merced counties its income would, under the most favorable conditions, be reduced to less than 5 per cent per annum on the value of the property as estimated by the board of supervisors.

The court also held that the company had waived the right to fix rates as high as permitted under the act of 1862, by failing to make them as high as therein permitted, prior to the passage of the act of 1885, and the act of 1885, "providing that the net annual receipts as adjusted by the board of supervisors should not be less than 6 nor more than 18 per cent per annum, is therefore properly applicable to the regulation of complainant's rates."

Mr. James P. Langhorne argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Duncan Hayne and Frederic D. McKenney, filed a brief for appellants:

The water rates and basis for fixing them, provided for by the act of 1862, did not constitute an unalterable contract with complainant, but were matters of regulation of a public use subject to the alterations made by the act of 1885, under the power reserved to the state of California in each of its Constitutions to alter from time to time, or repeal, laws relating to corporations.

All this court has decided and said with reference to the right of a state, under its reserved constitutional power, reasonably to alter and amend statutory or other regulations of railroad rates and turnpike tolls, and as to exemptions from taxation, and as to the regulation of the exercise by private or by quasi-public corporations of public utilities, apply with special force to this case.

The only qualification of, or limitation to, this rule is, as has been said in Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 319, 24 L. ed. 357, that such alterations must be reasonable; they must be made in good faith, and be sustained within the scope and object of the act of incorporation. Sheer oppression and wrong cannot be inflicted under the guise of amendment or alteration.

While the cost of the works is an element to be considered, yet it is not the basis or chief element. The value of the property used and useful and the service rendered constitute the basis of valuation in arriving at the rates.

However broad may be the terms of a state constitution or statute reserving the right to amend the charter of a corporation, that power is not without limit. Notwithstanding such a reservation, the vested rights of the corporation are as inviolable as in other cases; nor can such a power be so exercised as to destroy the grant.

Mr. Justice Peckham, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

First. The question which first arises in [206] this case is whether *there was a contract with the company under the act of 1862, by reason of which the state could not thereafter authorize the board of supervisors to reduce the rates so low as to yield less than 1½ per cent per month upon the capital actually invested.

The acts of 1853 and 1862 are general laws, the former providing for the formation of corporations of the character named therein, and the latter amending that act, and especially providing for the incorporation of canal companies, and the construction of canals. No special charter was given the company directly from the legislature otherwise than is contained in the powers granted by the two acts above named. A company, although organized under a general statute, may nevertheless thereby enter into and obtain a contract from the state which may be of such a nature that it can only be altered in case power to alter was, prior thereto, provided for in the Constitution or legislation of the state.

In East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 13 Wall. 373, 20 L. ed. 611, it was said by Mr. Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the court, page 378, L. ed. p. 614, that—

“Corporations formed under general laws in place of special charters, like the Ohio banks under the general banking law of that state, are entitled to the benefit of specific provisions and exemptions contained in those laws, which are regarded in the same light as if inserted in special charters. ‘The act is as special to each bank,’ says Justice McLean, delivering the opinion of this court, ‘as if no other institutions were incorporated under it.’ In such cases the scope of the act takes in the whole period for which the corporation is formed. The language means that, during the existence of any corporation formed under the act, the stipulation or exemption specified in it is to operate.”

The language used in conferring power to fix rates in the act of 1862 is to be taken as if it were contained in a special charter granted by the legislature to this company. The question then arises whether language such as is contained in the 3d *section of [207] that act, and which is set forth in the foregoing statement of facts, amounts to a contract, to be protected by the Constitution of the United States. We think it does not.

It seems to us that language of this nature cannot properly be construed as a promise or pledge that the limitation as to rates may not be altered at any time when, in the judgment of the legislature, it may be proper so to do. Water rates which might have been perfectly reasonable at the time of the passage of the act of 1862, although amounting to 1½ per cent per month upon the capital actually invested, might, in the course of years, become exceedingly burdensome to those who used the water, and amount to a very unreasonable compensation to the company for the water it sold. Irrigation by means of corporations formed to supply water was in its infancy in 1862 in California, and the risks necessarily taken in the organization of such companies, and the prosecution of their work, were then not only very large, but also extremely uncertain in character. Consequently, a rate of compensation was proper at that time which, in the course of years and the accumulated experience as to the necessary cost of such works, and of their successful operation, including the consideration of the risk attendant upon their operation, would make a water rate, as provided by the act of 1862, a very unreasonable overcharge. These facts must have been present in the minds of those who enacted the legislation of 1862, and it would be most unreasonable to suppose that it was intended by any such legislation to forever thereafter tie the hands of the state in regard to all companies organized under the act of 1862, and before the passage of the act of 1885.

The authority given by the act of 1862 enabled the board of supervisors to conditionally regulate the rates. There is no promise made in the act that the legislature would not itself subsequently alter that authority. The state simply authorized its agents, the boards of supervisors, to regulate rates, but not to reduce them below a certain point. We do not think that from this language a contract can or ought to be *implied that the state might not there-[208] after authorize the boards to reduce them, or that it might not itself do so directly. Even as between individuals, such an implication would not be a reasonable one from the language used, and as the contract, if it existed, would take away from the legislature its otherwise undoubted right of regulation upon a subject of great public importance, there is still less reason for implying a contract which would prevent the state from using its power to that end for the future. The language of this portion of the act applies to the boards and limits their right of reduction leaving unhampered the right of the state to interfere directly or by authorizing the boards to reduce the rates below the point stated in the act. In order to make such a contract the language must be plain, and susceptible of no other reasonable construction. Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport City, 180 U. S. 587-599, 45 L. ed. 679-688, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493, citing Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307-325, 29 L. ed. 636-642, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191.

In our belief, the language of the act of 1862 does not and was not intended to form a contract, but simply amounted to the statement of the then pleasure of the legislature, to so remain until subsequently altered by it. The cases heretofore decided in this court are authority for this view. Some of them are now referred to.

In Christ Church v. Philadelphia County, 24 How. 300, 16 L. ed. 602, the following language was used in the statute: "The real property, including ground rents, now belonging and payable to Christ Church hospital, in the city of Philadelphia, so long as the same shall continue to belong to the said hospital, shall be and remain free from taxes." A subsequent law provided that all property belonging to an association or incorporated company which was then by law exempt from taxation should thereafter be subject to taxation in the same manner as other property. The later law was held not be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It was held that language such as this was nothing but in the nature of a privilege, which existed only during the pleasure of, and might be revoked by, the sovereign power whenever it chose so to do.

[209] East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw*, 13 Wall. 373, 20 L. ed. 611, was a case where the court held that the language used was that conferring a bounty, and that it did not amount to a contract in such a sense that it could not be repealed, although it did grant an exemption from taxation of the property used for the purpose of obtaining salt. In regard to the language exempting the property from taxation, the court said:

"The law in question says to all: You shall have a bounty of 10 cents per bushel for all salt manufactured, and the property used shall be free from taxes. But it does not say how long this shall continue; nor do the parties who enter upon the business promise how long they will continue the manufacture. It is an arrangement determinable at the will of either of the parties, as much so as the hiring of a laboring man by the day."

In Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 527, 22 L. ed. 805, it was also held that an act of the legislature exempting property of a railroad company from taxation was not a contract to exempt it unless there were a consideration for the act; that, without it, the promise was of a gratuity, spontaneously made, which might be kept, changed, or recalled, at pleasure, and that the rule applies to the agreements of states made without consideration as well as to those of persons.

In Welch v. Cook, 97 U. S. 541, 24 L. ed. 1112, the act of the legislative assembly of the District of Columbia of June 26, 1873, exempted from general taxes for ten years thereafter such real and personal property as might be actually employed within the District for manufacturing purposes. It was held that the language did not create an irrevocable contract with the owners of such property, but simply conferred a bounty, liable at any time to be withdrawn.

In Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. v. New Orleans, 166 U. S. 143, 41 L. ed. 951, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 523, the language exempted the property from taxation "so long as it is occupied as a Grand Lodge of the F. and A. Masons;" and it was held that it did not constitute a contract between the state and the plaintiff, but was a mere continuing gratuity, *which the legislature was at [210] liberty to terminate and withdraw at any time.

In Wisconsin & M. R. Co. v. Powers, decided at this term (191 U. S. 379, ante, 229, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 107), the language of the act was: "That the rate of taxation fixed by this act or any other law of this state shall not apply to any railway or railroad company hereafter building and operating a line of railroad within this state north of parallel forty-four of latitude, until the same has been operated for the full period of ten years, unless the gross earnings shall equal $4,000 per mile." After the railroad company had been organized, and while that act was in force, and on June 4, 1897, the state passed a law levying a specific tax upon the property and business of every railroad corporation operated within the state. The road in question would have been entitled to the exemption stated in the prior law if it were in force. The railroad contended that it had a contract by virtue of the language above set forth. This court held that no contract arose from the language used, and that consequently the subsequent act providing for taxation did not violate the Federal Constitution in regard to contracts.

Sufficient cases have been cited to show that language quite as strong as that used in the act of 1862 does not amount to a contract. It is true that the cases cited involved questions of alleged contracts for exemption from taxation, in regard to which it has been said that no presumption exists in favor of a contract by a state to exempt lands from taxation, and that every reasonable doubt should be resolved against it. Statutes of California, providing that the use of all water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution should be a public use, and subject to public regulation and control, are valid (San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804), and companies formed for the purpose of furnishing water for irrigation purposes have been held in that state to be public municipal corporations, and the use of the water for the purpose mentioned a public use. See cases cited in Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 159, 41 L. ed. 369, 388, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56. To regulate or es-

[211]tablish rates for which *water will be supplied is in its nature the execution of one of the powers of the state, and the right of the state so to do should not be regarded as parted with any sooner than the right of taxation should be so regarded, and the language of the alleged contract should in both cases be equally plain. Owensboro v. Owensboro Waterworks Co. 191 U. S. 358, ante, 217, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 82.

In our judgment the language of the act of 1862 did not amount to a contract that the rates for the use of water should never be lowered below the amount provided for in that act.

Second. But assuming there was a contract, we think the rates could be changed under that provision of the Constitution of the state adopted in 1849, article 4, § 31, which provided:

"Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act except for municipal purposes. All general laws and special acts passed pursuant to this section may be altered from time to time or repealed."

This court has had frequent occasion to discuss the meaning and extent of the power thus reserved, as it exists in about all the states, either by constitutional or statutory provisions.

Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 21 L. ed. 204, held that the object of reserving a power to amend or repeal (p. 458, L. ed. p. 206) was—

"To prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the state control over its contract with the corporators, which, without that provision, would be ir-repealable, and protected from any measures affecting its obligation."

It was also said (p. 459, L. ed. p. 206):

"The reservation affects the entire relation between the state and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities, derived by its charter directly from the state."

In Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 319, 24 L. ed. 357, it was stated that by virtue of the power to alter, revoke, or repeal an act, as provided in *the Constitution of Ohio, §[212] 2, article 1, the legislature did not impair the obligation of a contract in prescribing rates for passenger transportation by a new consolidated company, although one of the original companies, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, was organized under a charter which imposed no limitation as to rates.

In Close v. Glenwood Cemetery, 107 U. S. 466, 27 L. ed. 408, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 267, it was again held that a power reserved in the legislature to alter, amend, or repeal a charter authorizes it to make any alteration or amendment of the charter granted subject to it, which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, or any rights vested under it, and which the legislature may deem necessary to secure either that object or any public right.

The same principle was decided in Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 720, 25 L. ed. 496, 501; New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 269, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437, and United States v. Union P. R. Co. 160 U. S. 1, 33, 40 L. ed. 319, 330, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190.

Covington v. Kentucky, 173 U. S. 231, 43 L. ed. 679, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, decided that language describing certain property, and providing that it should be and remain forever exempt from state, county, and city tax, did not prevent the legislature from withdrawing such exemption, and subjecting the property to taxation, in view of the statute that all charters and grants of the corporations should be subject to amendment or repeal at will of the legislature. Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court, said (p. 238, L. ed. p. 682, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 386):

"We are of opinion that the exemption from taxation embodied in that act did not tie the hands of the commonwealth of Kentucky so that it could not, by legislation, withdraw such exemption, and subject the property in question to taxation. The act of 1886 was passed subject to the provision in a general statute of Kentucky, above referred to, that all statutes 'shall be subject to amendment or repeal at the will of the legislature, unless a contrary intent be therein plainly expressed.' If that act in any sense constituted a contract between the city and the commonwealth, the reservation [213] in an *existing general statute of the right to amend or repeal it was itself a part of that contract."

To the same effect is Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 189 U. S. 434, 47 L. ed. 887, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 531.

These cases also hold that there is a limitation, even to the power of amendment, when reserved in the constitution or a statute of a state. Some of the cases, although holding that the power to amend or repeal was properly exercised in them, also state that the power is not without limit; that the alterations must be reasonably made, in good faith, and consistent with the scope and object of the act of incorporation, and that sheer oppression and wrong could not be inflicted under the guise of amendment or alteration; that beyond the sphere of the reserved powers the vested rights of property in corporations in such cases are surrounded by the same sanction and are as inviolable as in other cases. In reiterating this view of the power, we think that a mere reduction of rates, while still leaving reasonable, fair, or just compensation for the use of the property, is not prohibited, and we are quite clear that, even assuming there was a contract, the legislature nevertheless had the power to so alter and amend the act of 1862 as to provide for the fixing of rates as set forth in the act of 1885.

It is not confiscation, nor a taking of property without due process of law, nor a denial of the equal protection of the laws, to fix water rates so as to give an income of 6 per cent upon the then value of the property actually used for the purpose of supplying water as provided by law, even though the company had, prior thereto, been allowed to fix rates that would secure to it 1½ per cent a month income upon the capital actually invested in the undertaking. If not hampered by an unalterable contract, providing that a certain compensation should always be received, we think that a law which reduces the compensation therefore allowed to 6 per cent upon the present value of the property used for the public is not unconstitutional. There is nothing in the nature of confiscation about it.

[214] The original cost may have been too great; mistakes of construction, even though honest, may have been made, which necessarily enhanced the cost; more property may have been acquired than necessary or needful for the purpose intended. Other circumstances might exist which would show the original rates much too large for fair or reasonable compensation at the present time. Notwithstanding such facts, are the shareholders in the company to be forever entitled to 18 per cent upon this cost, and does a reduction in amount, as provided for in the act of 1885, take away property, in violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution? We think not.

In this case much of the total amount expended in the course of the construction of the works was not proved by those who made such expenditures, and the items and total amount of the cost of construction were only proved by the books. What such books did not prove was the reasonableness of that cost, its propriety or necessity. There were statements that appeared in the minutes of the meetings of the shareholders which were put in evidence, that showed at least a dispute as to the proper cost of the works, and at one of these meetings a shareholder said there had been a waste in the management of the affairs of the company amounting to $350,000, which was caused by the chief engineer, who had been in charge of the canal, and that his mistakes had cost the company a good deal of money. There would seem to have been more of a dispute as to who was responsible for this loss than over the fact of loss. At another meeting held in December, 1881, the president had said in his remarks to the meeting that, in his opinion, with careful management the canal would pay a fair revenue on what it ought to have cost. Although these minutes did not conclusively prove the fact of the excessive cost of the work, yet, where the books of the company were substantially the only evidence of the amount expended, and there was no other satisfactory evidence of the reasonableness of the expenditures, it would not be surprising if the board should have *regarded the state-[215] ments in the minutes relating to excessive cost as a justification, if not a requirement, for the reduction of the cost of construction, upon which rates might be fixed, by at least the amount mentioned,—$350,000.

Other considerations, in the shape of facts, circumstances, and conditions pertinent to the alleged cost of the work, and appearing in the course of the inquiry, may have been considered by the supervisors, and the conclusion arrived at, after a consideration of all the material facts, that the rates fixed would result in justice to both the company and the consumers, as called for by the act.

Judging by this record, we are unable to say the board of supervisors failed to provide just and fair compensation for the use of the property by the public.

In San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804, it was held (following Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 543, 544, 42 L. ed. 819, 848, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418), that what the company was entitled to demand in order that it might have just compensation was a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it was being used for the public. The appellants in that case contended that in fixing what were just rates the court should take into consideration the cost of the plant and of its annual operation, the depreciation of the plant, and a fair profit to the company above its charges for its services. It was observed by the court that undoubtedly all these matters ought to be taken into consideration and such weight be given them, when rates are being fixed, as, under all the circumstances, would be just to the company and to the public. The same principle is reaffirmed in San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Jasper, 189 U. S. 439, 442, 47 L. ed. 892, 894, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571.

After taking such facts into consideration, the company might still be directed to receive rates that would be nothing more than a fair and just compensation or return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it was being used for the supplying of the water to the public.

To take the amount actually invested into "estimation" does not mean necessarily that [216] such amount is to control the *decision of the question of rates. Other language would have been employed to express that thought. The cost may be estimated, says the act, but that leaves open a reference to the other facts adverted to in the latter part of § 5, and it is upon a consideration of the whole case that the board is to determine what shall be reasonable, just, and equal to all parties. The record would seem to show that the board did take these various matters into consideration in coming to the conclusion it did in regard to the value of the property, although giving much less weight to such alleged cost than the company thought was proper. The board added over $25,000 to the amount proved as the present cost of the construction of the canals, based on the prices of material, supplies, and labor, of the date when the estimate was made, that estimate being $312,000, while the board fixed the valuation at $337,000.

Much of the capital was invested between twenty and thirty years ago, and to be able still to realize 6 per cent upon the money originally invested is more than most people are able to accomplish in any ordinary investment, and more than is necessary in order to give just compensation for property at the time it is used for the public purpose originally intended.

It is, of course, impossible to say what rates may be adopted in the other counties through which this canal runs, and that is one of the embarrassments under which the parties suffer from the language of the statute of 1885. Heretofore the company has fixed its own rates therein. Exactly how the question may be hereafter determined as to the percentage of income, where there are three different boards of supervisors who may fix rates for their respective counties, each differing from the other, is not made clear by the statute. The complainant admits that the rates provided for by the supervisors under the act of 1885, if applied to all three counties, would allow complainant an income of substantially 6 per cent on $337,000, being $25,000 more than the present cost of the work would be, as shown by uncontradicted and satisfactory evidence. Those rates exist in the other counties at present.

*Hereafter, in case the other counties [217] should fix rates in such manner that, taken as a whole, the rates in the three counties would not insure an income of at least 6 per cent, as provided for in the act of 1885, the company would, of course, not be bound to accept such rates, and a decree in this case would not bind it in regard to the propriety of rates for the future, as fixed by the ordinance of 1896 for the county of Stanislaus.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed and the bill dismissed without prejudice.

So ordered.

Eminent domain — what constitutes a taking.

The injury from overflow and erosion to the lands of a riparian proprietor as the result of the action of the Mississippi river through a series of years is not such a direct consequence of the construction by the Federal government farther up the stream of a revetment along the banks, which did not change the course of the river as it then existed, but operated to prevent further changes, as to make such governmental action a taking of private property for public use within the meaning of the 5th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Argued December 9, 1903. Decided January 18, 1904.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment dismissing a petition for an award of damages to real property, alleged to be the result of the construction of certain public works by the United States. Affirmed.

See same case below, 36 Ct. Cl. 474.

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

The appellants were owners of land on the Mississippi river in the state of Louisiana, amounting to 5,000 or 6,000 acres, upon which were cabins, other buildings, and fences. They brought suit in the court of claims for damages to their lands, alleged to have resulted from certain works of the United States. The damages consisted, as found by the court, of the erosion and overflow of about 2,300 acres of the land. The works of the government, and their operation, are described by the court in the following findings:

[218] "Prior to the spring of 1876 the Mississippi river flowed *around a narrow neck of land known as De Soto point; and, in going around this point, flowed by the city of Vicksburg in a southwesterly direction. In the spring of 1876 De Soto point became so narrow by erosion that the river broke through, leaving De Soto point as an island, thereby shortening the distance of the stream about 6 miles, and taking its course immediately to the south with great velocity against the Mississippi bank at what is known as the cut-off of 1876. The result was that the city of Vicksburg was left some miles away from the main channel of the river, and the old channel in front of the city was continually filled up, making the approach from the river to the docks along the river difficult, if not impossible.

"Between 1878 and 1884 the United States constructed about 10,700 feet of revetment along the banks of the Mississippi river at Delta point, Louisiana, for the purpose of preventing the further erosion of that point. The revetment consisted of willow mattresses weighted down by stones, and were placed on sand banks below high-water mark. The revetment was neither upon nor in contact with the claimant's land. The object of the construction was to prevent the navigable channel of the river from receding farther from the city of Vicksburg, which had been left some distance from the main channel of the river by the cut-off of 1876, as aforesaid. The revetment was repaired slightly in 1866 and 1889, and more extensively in 1894, all of which work was paid for from time to time out of the appropriations made therefor by Congress, as found in 20 Stat. at L. 363, 366, chap. 181; 21 Stat. at L. 181, chap. 211; 21 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 136; 26 Stat. at L. 450, chap. 907; 26 Stat. at L. 1116.

"In making the improvement aforesaid, the defendants did not recognize any right of property in the claimants in and to the right alleged to be affected, and did not assume to take private property in and by the construction of the revetment, but proceeded in the exercise of a claimed right to improve the navigation of the river.

"After the cut-off at De Soto point in 1876, and the construction of the revetment, as aforesaid, the channel and current *of the [219] Mississippi river were gradually directed toward the lands of the claimants, situated about 6 miles below said cut-off, and did, about the year 1882, reach said lands and thereafter erode and overflow about 2,300 acres of their lands, which overflow has ever since continued. About 400 acres of their lands so eroded and overflowed was prior to the death of said George M. Bedford, through whom the claimants claim title, and about 900 acres of which were overflowed thereafter and prior to said judicial sale, and the residue after said sale. Of the lands so overflowed about 1,300 acres thereof were cleared and in cultivation, of which about 700 acres were so cleared prior to May 2, 1895.

"The damage to the claimants, and each of them, by reason of the washing away of their lands during their respective ownership, as aforesaid, is an excess of $3,000.

"The cause of the deflection of the river upon the claimants' land was the cut-off, which shortened the distance of the stream 6 miles, and thereby increased the velocity of the current, and forced the current to turn, when it struck the Mississippi bank, at an abrupt angle. The revetment did not change the course of the river as it then existed, but operated to keep the course of the river at that point as it then was. If the revetment had not been built, the cut-off would have continued to widen toward the Louisiana bank, and the channel would have continued to move in the same direction. With the widening of the cut-off and the shifting of the channel the angle of the turn below the cut-off would have gradually become less abrupt, and the deflection of the stream upon the claimants' land would have grown less, and the consequent injury to the claimants' land would have been decreased. To what extent the injury would have been decreased is conjectural. The injury done to the claimants' land was an effect of natural causes; the injury caused by the government was by interrupting the further progress of natural causes, i. e., the further change in the course of the river, and is also conjectural."

[220] The court deduced from the facts that the claimants were *not entitled to recover, and dismissed their petitions. 36 Ct. Cl. 474.

Mr. John C. Chaney argued the cause, and, with Messrs. E. T. Brookshire and Dabney & McCabe, filed a brief for appellants:

Land, not being subject to servitude to navigation, was appropriated outright by the government to a public use, and the Constitution guarantees payment therefor.

United States v. Lynah, 188 U. S. 445, 47 L. ed. 539, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 112 U. S. 645, 28 L. ed. 846, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 181, 20 L. ed. 561.

An implied contract consequently arises to pay for such appropriation of property.

United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 112 U. S. 645, 28 L. ed. 846, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306; Langford v. United States, 101 U. S. 341, 25 L. ed. 1010; Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. ed. 206; United States v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 27 L. ed. 1015, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346; Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. ed. 672; Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. 84, 15 L. ed. 816; Hollister v. Benedict & B. Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 59, 28 L. ed. 901, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 717; United States v. Palmer, 128 U. S. 262, 32 L. ed. 442, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104; United States v. Berdan Firearms Mfg. Co. 156 U. S. 552, 39 L. ed. 530, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420; United States v. Lynah, 188 U. S. 445, 47 L. ed. 539, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349. See also South Carolina v. Georgia, 93 U. S. 4, 23 L. ed. 782; Wisconsin v. Duluth, 96 U. S. 379, 24 L. ed. 668.

A serious interruption to the common and necessary use of property is a taking of it, and it is not necessary that the land be absolutely taken.

Angell, Water Courses, § 465a.

This is a "taking" of appellants' lands for public use.

Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 181, 20 L. ed. 561; Angell, Water Courses, § 465a; Hooker v. New Haven & N. Co. 14 Conn. 146, 36 Am. Dec. 477; Rowe v. Granite Bridge Corp. 21 Pick. 344; Canal Appraisers v. People, 17 Wend. 604; Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 180; Stevens v. Middlesex Canal, 12 Mass. 466.

Although in the discharge of its duties the government may appropriate property, it cannot do so without being liable to the obligation cast by the 5th Amendment, of paying just compensation.

Permanent flooding of private property may be regarded as a taking.

Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 336.

Assistant Attorney General Pradt argued the cause, and, with Mr. William H. Button, filed a brief for defendant in error:

A riparian owner may preserve existing conditions, although he may not erect constructions which will change those conditions. Subject to this limitation, he may preserve his property irrespective of the consequences to his neighbors.

Angell, Water Courses, 7th ed. § 333; Barnes v. Marshall, 68 Cal. 569, 10 Pac. 115; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 41 C. C. A. 597, 101 Fed. 678.

It would seem that the same principle will apply to the United States in its protection of the property interests intrusted to its care.

The damage is too remote to constitute a taking.

Damages that are speculative and conjectural in their nature cannot be recovered.

Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 35 L. ed. 147, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500; Central Trust Co. v. Clark, 34 C. C. A. 354, 92 Fed. 293.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no dispute about the power of the government to construct the works which, it is claimed, caused the damage to appellants' land. It was alleged by appellants that they were constructed by the "United States in the execution of its rights and powers in and over said river, and in pursuance of its lawful control over the navigation of said river, and for the betterment and improvement thereof." And also that the works were not constructed upon appellants' land, and their immediate object was to prevent further erosion at De Soto point. In other words, the object of the works was to preserve the conditions made by natural causes. By constructing works to secure that object, appellants contend there was given to them a right to compensation. The contention asserts a right in a riparian proprietor to the unrestrained operation of natural causes, and that works of the government which resist or disturb those causes, if injury result to riparian owners, have the effect of taking private property for public use within the meaning of the 5th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The consequences of the contention immediately challenge its soundness. What is its limit? Is only the government so restrained? Why [224] not as well riparian proprietors? *Are they also forbidden to resist natural causes, whatever devastation by floods or erosion threaten their property? Why, for instance, would not, under the principle asserted, the appellants have had a cause of action against the owner of the land at the cut-off if he had constructed the revetment? And if the government is responsible to one landowner below the works, why not to all landowners? The principle contended for seems necessarily wrong. Asserting the rights of riparian property, it might make that property valueless. Conceding the power of the government over navigable rivers, it would make that power impossible of exercise, or would prevent its exercise by the dread of an immeasurable responsibility.

There is another principle by which the rights of riparian property and the power of the government over navigable rivers are better accommodated. It is illustrated in many cases.

The Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken without just compensation, but a distinction has been made between damage and taking, and that distinction must be observed in applying the constitutional provision. An excellent illustration is found in Gibson v. United States, 166 U. S. 269, 41 L. ed. 996, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578. The distinction is there instructively explained, and other cases need not be cited. It is, however, necessary to refer to United States v. Lynah, 188 U. S. 445, 47 L. ed. 539, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349, as it is especially relied upon by appellants. The facts are stated in the following excerpt from the opinion:

"It appears from the 5th finding, as amended, that a large portion of the land flooded was, in its natural condition, between high-water mark and low-water mark, and was subject to overflow as the water passed from one stage to the other; that this natural overflow was stopped by an embankment, and in lieu thereof, by means of flood gates, the land was flooded and drained at the will of the owner. From this it is contended that the only result of the raising of the level of the river by the government works was to take away the [225] possibility of drainage. But findings IX.

and X. show that, both by seepage and percolation through the embankment and an actual flowing upon the plantation above the obstruction, the water has been raised in the plantation about 18 inches; that it is impossible to remove this overflow of water, and, as a consequence, the property has become an irreclaimable bog, unfit for the purpose of rice culture or any other known agriculture, and deprived of all value. It is clear from these findings that what was a valuable rice plantation has been permanently flooded, wholly destroyed in value, and turned into an irreclaimable bog; and this as the necessary result of the work which the government has undertaken."

The question was asked: "Does this amount to a taking?" To which it was replied: "The case of Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557, answers this question in the affirmative." And further: "The Green Bay Company, as authorized by statute, constructed a dam across Fox river, by means of which the land of Pumpelly was overflowed and rendered practically useless to him. There, as here, no proceedings had been taken to formally condemn the land." In both cases, therefore, it was said that there was an actual invasion and appropriation of land as distinguished from consequential damage. In the case at bar the damage was strictly consequential. It was the result of the action of the river through a course of years. The case at bar, therefore, is distinguishable from the Lynah Case in the cause and manner of the injury. In the Lynah Case the works were constructed in the bed of the river, obstructed the natural flow of its water, and were held to have caused, as a direct consequence, the overflow of Lynah's plantation. In the case at bar the works were constructed along the banks of the river, and their effect was to resist erosion of the banks by the waters of the river. There was no other interference with natural conditions. Therefore, the damage to appellants' land, if it can be assigned to the works at all, was but an incidental consequence of them.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Massey Wilson submitted the cause for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the supreme court of Alabama, brought on the ground that the plaintiff in error, one Rogers, has been denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Rogers was indicted for murder, and in due time filed a motion to quash the indictment because the jury commissioners appointed to select the grand jury excluded from the list of persons to serve as grand jurors all colored persons, although largely in the majority of the population of the county, and although otherwise qualified to serve as grand jurors, solely on the ground of their race and color and of their having been disfranchised and deprived of all rights as electors in the state of Alabama by the provisions of the new Constitution of Alabama. The motion alleged that the grand jury was composed exclusively of persons of the white race, and concluded with a verification. To show the reality of the second reason alleged for the exclusion of blacks from the grand-jury list, the motion, as a preliminary, alleged that the sections of the new Constitution which were before this court in Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475, 47 L. ed. 909, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 639, were adopted for the purpose, and had the effect, of disfranchising all the blacks on account of their race and color and previous condition of servitude. On motion of the state this motion to quash was stricken from the files. Rogers excepted, but his exceptions were overruled by the supreme court of the state, seemingly on the ground that the prolixity of the motion was sufficient to justify the action of the court below. The Civil Code of Alabama provides by § 3286, "if any pleading is unnecessarily prolix, irrelevant, or frivolous, it may be stricken out at the costs of the party so pleading, on motion of the adverse party."

We follow the construction impliedly adopted by the supreme court of Alabama, and assume that this section was applicable to the motion. We also assume, as said by the court, that the qualifications of the grand jurors are not in law dependent upon the qualifications of electors, and that any invalidity of the conditions attached to the suffrage could not of itself affect the validity of the indictment. But in our opinion that was not the allegation. The allegation was that the conditions said to be invalid worked as a reason and consideration in the minds of the commissioners for excluding blacks from the list. It may be that the allegation was superfluous and would have been hard to prove, but it was not irrelevant, for it stated motives for the exclusion which, however mistaken, if proved, tended to show that the blacks were excluded on account of their race, as part of a scheme to keep them from having any part in the administration of the government or of the law. The whole motion takes two pages of the printed record, of the ordinary octavo size. A motion of that length, made for the sole purpose of setting up a constitutional right, and distinctly claiming it, cannot be withdrawn for prolixity from the consideration of this court, under the color of local practice, because it contains a statement of matter which, perhaps, it would have been better to omit, but which is relevant to the principal fact averred.

It is a necessary and well-settled rule that the exercise of jurisdiction by this court to protect constitutional rights cannot be declined when it is plain that the fair result of a decision is to deny the rights. It is well known that this court will decide for itself whether a contract was made as well as whether the obligation of the contract has been impaired. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436, 443, 17 L. ed. 173, 177. But that is merely an illustration of a more general rule. On the same ground (231) *there can be no doubt that if full faith and credit were denied to a judgment rendered in another state upon a suggestion of want of jurisdiction, without evidence to warrant the finding, this court would enforce the constitutional requirement. See German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Dormitzer (Jan. 4, 1904) 192 U. S. 125, ante, 373, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221. In Chapman v. Goodnow, 123 U. S. 540, 547, 548, 31 L. ed. 235, 238, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211, where the parties sought to avoid the obligation of a former decree by new matter, this court said that the effect of what was done was not a Federal question, but proceeded to inquire in terms whether that ground of decision was the real one, or whether it was set up as an evasion, and merely to give color to a refusal to allow the bar of the decree. We are of opinion that the Federal question is raised by the record, and is properly before us. That question is disposed of by Carter v. Texas, 177 U. S. 442, 44 L. ed. 839, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687, and it was error not to apply that decision. The result of that and the earlier cases may be summed up in the following words of the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Gray: "Whenever, by any action of a state, whether through its legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded, solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 25 L. ed. 664; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 397, 26 L. ed. 567, 574; Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U. S. 565, 40 L. ed. 1075, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 904." Our judgment upon this point makes it unnecessary to consider a motion to quash the panel of the petit jury for similar reasons, which was disposed of as having been made too late.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

MINNIE D. GOLDBERG and George Goldberg.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 232-243.)

Appeal — amount in dispute — rescission of contract for fraud — misrepresentations which do not deceive — use of property after discovery of the fraud.

1. The amount in dispute in a suit for equitable relief because of fraud in a sale of real property exceeds the sum of $5,000, which is essential, under the act of February 9, 1893 (27 Stat. at L. 434, chap. 74, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 573), to enable the Supreme Court of the United States to review a judgment of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, although the bill prays for the conveyance of a strip of land of slight value, where, if such relief is denied, the complainant seeks, in the alternative, to have the contract rescinded and the payment decreed of the sum of $6,000, the purchase money, with costs and interest.
2. Misrepresentations by a vendor of real property with reference to its area are not actionable, where a correct description of the property was given in the deed and recorded chain of title, which the purchaser's agent undertook to investigate and report upon, and the vendor made no effort to prevent a full investigation.
3. A purchaser of real property cannot rescind the contract of sale because of the vendor's misrepresentations with reference to its area, where, after discovering the fraud, he collected rents for some months upon the property, corresponded with the vendor as to future terms of rental, declined to reduce the rent, made repairs, and performed other acts of ownership.

Decided January 18, 1904.*

APPEAL from the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment which affirmed a decree of the Supreme Court of the District dismissing a bill filed by a purchaser of real property to obtain equitable relief because of the fraud of the vendor. Affirmed.

The fact that he has the means of knowing or obtaining information of the truth, which he did not use, is not sufficient. It is not, indeed, enough that he may have been wanting in caution.

Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 79, 80.

The effect of what would be otherwise noticed may be destroyed, not only by actual misrepresentations, but by anything calculated to deceive, or even to lull suspicion upon a particular point.

Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 81.

The maxim, Caveat emptor, does not apply when there is a positive misrepresentation, essentially material to the subject in question, provided proper diligence be used by the purchaser in the course of the transaction. The rule at least of caveat emptor, where there is a misrepresentation, if applicable at all, must be applied with great care. Nor will a condition in the particulars of a sale, that misdescription or errors in sale shall not annul the sale, cover a fraudulent misrepresentation.

Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 81, 82.

A person upon whom fraud has been practised has a right to understand all the facts and circumstances, and be fully advised of his rights, before beginning suit,—especially if no rights of third parties have intervened.

When a party injured by fraud is in ignorance of its existence, the duty to commence proceedings arises only upon discovery, and mere submission to an injury after the act inflicting it is completed cannot, in the absence of other circumstances, take away the right of action.

It is no objection to specific enforcement of a contract to convey land that the legal title is not held by a party to the contract, where such a person is a party to the suit, and it appears that he holds the title in trust for the vendor.

McDonald v. Yungbluth, 46 Fed. 836.

Where one who agrees to sell certain land receives the full consideration therefor, and then fraudulently gives a deed conveying only part of the land, a specific enforcement of the contract may be had in equity, even though the contract be oral.

Ibid.

Where the parties stand upon the land they are bargaining for, and examine the same, and it is marked by fences 5 feet high and other monuments, and a deed is made conveying more than the land inclosed and viewed, even if both parties mutually understand and believe the description of the property in the deed is correct, the court will require the grantee to reconvey so much or such part as is not within the inclosed lines.

Goode v. Riley, 153 Mass. 585, 28 N. E. 228.

The rule that a contract cannot be rescinded unless the parties can be placed in statu quo does not apply where one party has obtained advantage over the other by means of fraud, and such rescission would further the ends of justice, and the court can still reach and enforce equities between them; or if fraud or the act of the parties prevent such placing in statu quo.

Coffee v. Ruffin, 4 Coldw. 487.

Likewise, where a party who wishes to rescind a contract restores, or offers to restore, what he has received under the contract without unreasonable delay, the fact that the other party by his default renders full restoration impossible will not defeat the former's right to rescind.

Hammond v. Pennoek, 61 N. Y. 145.

A party practising a fraud may be required by bill in equity to do what he agreed to do. If he cannot, the contract will be rescinded.

Mr. Thomas M. Fields submitted the cause for appellees:

It is settled law that a fraud on one person is no ground for redress or relief on behalf of a stranger to the transaction. It is a general rule that a person cannot complain of false representations, either for the purpose of maintaining an action for deceit, or for the purpose of avoiding a contract, unless the representations were made, either directly to him, with the intention that they should be acted upon by him, or, if made to some other person, unless they were made with the intention that they should be communicated to him, and acted upon by him.

Beckett v. Tyler, 3 MacArth. 319.

Fraud in fact will never be presumed, but must be proved. All other things being equal, the motive and design of a representation will be attributed to honest, rather than corrupt, motives. A purchaser of a title under a slave marriage, having notice of doubts as to the validity of the marriage, cannot claim that he was induced to purchase by fraudulent representations as to the marriage.

Where a party desires to rescind a contract upon the ground of mistake or fraud, he must, upon the discovery of the facts, at once announce his purpose and adhere to it. Harper v. Baird, 3 Penn. (Del.) 110, 50 Atl. 326.

Misrepresentation, to vitiate the contract of sale, must relate to a material fact, constituting an inducement to the contract, of which the complaining party had no means of knowledge, and upon which he relied, and by which he was actually misled to his injury.

Slaughter v. Gerson, 13 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 627.

The neglect to make reasonable examination will preclude a purchaser from rescinding a contract of purchase on the ground of false and fraudulent representations. In a suit in equity to set aside a contract and conveyances by which lands were exchanged, for false and fraudulent representations, where the evidence shows that, in making the exchange no reliance was placed upon the representations, but that the party acted upon his own judgment and upon information obtained from third persons, no ground is shown for maintaining the suit.

Slaughter v. Gerson, 13 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 627.

Such will be the case if the party to whom the representation is made resorts to the proper means of verification, so as to show that he in fact relied on his own inquiries; or if the means of investigation and verification are at hand, and his attention is drawn to them; or if the representation regards a mere matter of opinion or inference with respect to which both parties have equal means of forming a judgment.

Where both parties have equal means of information, so that by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence either may rely upon his own judgment, misrepresentations, though false, will not be considered fraudulent.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action begun in the supreme court of the District of Columbia by Mary Shappirio and Jacob Shappirio, her husband, against Minnie D. Goldberg and George Goldberg, her husband, having for its object equitable relief because of alleged fraud of the respondents in the sale of certain property in Washington, District of Columbia, to the complainant, Mary Shappirio.

It appears that the sale was made through one Richold, a broker in real estate. George Goldberg was the owner of the property, and by memorandum made on May 11, 1900, authorized Richold to sell the property known as lots Nos. 1245 and 1247, being part of lot 28, square 977, fronting 34 feet on 11th street S. E., by 80 feet deep to an alley. Richold sold the property to Jacob Shappirio, for whom he was seeking an investment, for the price of $6,000. The terms were cash, $100 having been paid down at the making of the sale. This property, having two buildings upon it, and being part of lot 28, is described as follows:

"Beginning for the same at the southeast corner of said lot and running thence north on Eleventh street thirty-four (34) feet; thence west eighty (80) feet eight (8) inches to an alley; thence south on said alley fourteen (14) feet; thence east eighteen (18) feet; thence south twenty (20) feet, and thence east sixty-two (62) feet eight (8) inches to the place of beginning."

In the rear of the premises there was a strip 20 by 30 feet, having upon it a shed or stable, which, before the sale, was in the possession of Goldberg under an arrangement for its use, and was used by him in connection with the premises. This piece was not fenced off at the time of sale, and might well be taken to be a part of the premises by any person examining the same without accurate knowledge of the extent of the property actually owned by Goldberg. The annexed plat shows the part of lot 28 covered by the description in the deed, and the part of lot 2 in dispute:

Although the purchase was made by Jacob Shappirio, the deed was made to Mary Shappirio, June 5, 1900. On September 28, 1900, a conveyance by the owner of the title to lot 2 was made of the part of that lot in the rear of the premises to Minnie D. Goldberg, wife of George Goldberg, for the consideration of $300. Mary Shappirio and Jacob Shappirio on *June 5, 1900, executed a deed [234] of trust upon the property conveyed to her, in the sum of $4,500. In the trust deed the property was accurately described.

After the property had been conveyed to Mary Shappirio it was rented to Goldberg, the vendor, who continued to occupy the same for eleven months. Upon asking a reduction of the rent, which was refused, Goldberg left the premises. On May 18, 1901, the present bill was filed, in which it was charged that Goldberg, in order to induce the sale in question, falsely represented that the property in the rear of lot 28 belonged to him, and would be included in the property sold, and notwithstanding the appearance of the property and the representations of Goldberg, the part conveyed did not include the part of lot 2 in the rear of lot 28; that George Goldberg afterwards purchased the property, part of lot 2, and caused the same to be conveyed to Minnie D. Goldberg, his wife, as a part of a scheme to defraud the plaintiff; that the wife was a party to the fraud, and had no interest in the property except to hold it for her husband.

The bill prays that this parcel of ground, part of lot 2, be decreed to be held by Minnie D. Goldberg for the use of the plaintiff, Mary Shappirio, and be conveyed to her. If this relief cannot be granted, the prayer is that the sale be rescinded, and Goldberg be required to pay back the amount of the purchase money, with costs and charges, and, upon default of payment, the property be sold.

A general denial of the allegations of fraud and deceit is made in the answer, together with the averment that the plaintiffs relied upon their own investigation, and if they were deceived as to the extent of the property, it was the result of the want of due care upon their part.

In the supreme court the bill of the complainant was dismissed, which decree was affirmed in the court of appeals.

[240] The first question raised for our consideration involves the *jurisdiction of this court on appeal, it being claimed that the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, does not exceed the sum of $5,000. By the act of February 9, 1893 (chap. 74, 27 Stat. at L. 434, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 573), jurisdiction to review the final judgments of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia is given where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $5,000, exclusive of costs. In determining this question we may look to the allegations and prayer of the bill to ascertain the relief sought and the real extent of the controversy between the parties. The bill contains a prayer for the conveyance of the small strip of ground, which was purchased for $300, and if that were the only subject-matter of the suit, the amount required to give this court the right of review would not be in controversy. But if this relief is denied, the complainant seeks, in the alternative, to have the contract rescinded and the payment of the sum of $6,000, the purchase money, with costs and interest, decreed against the respondent. Upon the pleadings we are of opinion that this sum is also in dispute between the parties, and therefore this court has jurisdiction. To ascertain the right of jurisdiction in such a case we look, not to a single feature of the case, but to the entire controversy between the parties. Stinson v. Dousman, 20 How. 461, 15 L. ed. 966.

In this case the issues are mainly those of fact, and, in the absence of clear showing of error, the findings of the two lower courts will be accepted as correct. Stuart v. Hayden, 169 U. S. 1, 42 L. ed. 639, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 274; Dravo v. Fabel, 132 U. S. 487, 33 L. ed. 421, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 170. An examination of the record in the light of these findings does not enable us to reach the conclusion that error has been committed, to the prejudice of the appellants.

As to what was said by Goldberg at the time of the purchase of the property, in conversation with Richold, the broker, and at the time the premises were visited by Shappirio with a view to purchase, there is much conflict of testimony. The use of the premises as a connected whole might well lead the purchaser to believe, in the absence of accurate knowledge, that it was all under the ownership of one person, and would be *in-[241] cluded in the sale of the property to him; and, as said by the court of appeals, we believe that Shappirio may have been ignorant of the true condition of the title. But it was also found by that court that a correct description of the property was given in the deed and recorded chain of title. Richold, who made the sale, was intrusted by Shappirio with the examination of the deed and title, and thirty days were given to complete the purchase. For this purpose Richold was the agent of Shappirio, and, it not appearing in the proof that he was misled by the representations of Goldberg, or that by any scheme or plan he was kept from a full examination of the title and the description of the property contained in the deed furnished, he must be held chargeable with knowledge which the opportunity before him afforded to investigate the extent and nature of the property conveyed and which he undertook to examine for the purchaser. It is true that Richold testifies that he was misled by the silence of Goldberg, and by the situation and use of the property, and stoutly denies that he had the knowledge which a reading of the accurate description of the deed would give. But he undertook to investigate the matter and report upon the title. A casual reading of the description in the deed or examination of the recorded plat would have shown that the premises were not of a uniform depth of 80 feet, and had the L-shape extension in the rear of the lot, which excludes any part of lot 2 from the premises conveyed. For the purpose of this examination Richold was the agent of Shappirio, and his knowledge and means of information must be imputed to the purchaser. There are cases where misrepresentations are made which deceive the purchaser, in which it is no defense to say that had the plaintiff declined to believe the representations, and investigated for himself, he would not have been deceived. Mead v. Bunn, 32 N. Y. 275.

But such cases are to be distinguished from the one under consideration. When the means of knowledge are open and at hand, or furnished to the purchaser or his agent, and no effort is made to prevent the party from using them, and especially where the [242] *purchaser undertakes examination for himself, he will not be heard to say that he has been deceived to his injury by the misrepresentations of the vendor. Slaughter v. Gerson, 13 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 627; Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 247, 31 L. ed. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881; Farrar v. Churchill, 135 U. S. 609, 34 L. ed. 246, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 771; Farnsworth v. Duffner, 142 U. S. 43, 35 L. ed. 931, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 164.

If this action is viewed as one to rescind a contract, in the light of the testimony and the findings of the courts below, the appellant stands upon no better ground.

It is well settled by repeated decisions of this court that where a party desires to rescind upon the ground of misrepresentation or fraud, he must, upon the discovery of the fraud, announce his purpose and adhere to it. If he continues to treat the property as his own the right of rescission is gone, and the party will be held bound by the contract. Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. ed. 798; McLean v. Clapp, 141 U. S. 429, 35 L. ed. 804, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 29. In other words, when a party discovers that he has been deceived in a transaction of this character he may resort to an action at law to recover damages, or he may have the transaction set aside in which he has been wronged, by the rescission of the contract. If he choose the latter remedy, he must act promptly, "announce his purpose and adhere to it," and not by acts of ownership continue to assert right and title over the property as though it belonged to him. In the present case, some months before the beginning of this action, probably in October, 1900, Shappirio learned that the conveyance did not include the premises, part of lot 2, in the rear of lot 28. It may be that the mere lapse of time in this case would not of itself have defeated the right to rescind, as a purchaser has a reasonable time in which to make election of such remedy after discovery of the fraud (Neblett v. Macfarland, 92 U. S. 101-105, 23 L. ed. 471, 472), but he cannot, after such discovery, treat the property as his own and exercise acts of ownership over it which show an election to regard the same as still his, and at the same time preserve his right to rescission. In the present case, after discovering that the part of lot 2 had not been con-

[243]veyed by the *deed, Shappirio collected rents for some months upon the property, corresponded with Goldberg as to future terms of rental, declined to reduce the rent, made some repairs upon the property, and performed other acts of ownership. This conduct is wholly inconsistent with an election to undo the transaction and stand upon his right to rescind the contract.

We find no error in the judgment of the Court of Appeals affirming the decree of the Supreme Court, and it is affirmed.

v.

HENRY WEINHARD. (No. 109)

COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK OF PORTLAND, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS. (No. 110)

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 243-253.)

National banks—power of directors—levy of assessment ordered by Comptroller.

Directors of a national bank are not empowered, without action of the stockholders, to levy the assessment ordered by the Comptroller for the purpose of restoring its capital and enabling it to continue in business, by U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5136, 5145 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3455, 3463), investing them with authority to transact the usual and ordinary business of national banks, since the provision of § 5205 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3495), for the appointment of a receiver to close up the business of the banking association in case it fails to pay up its capital stock, and refuses to go into liquidation, evidently confers upon the association the privilege of declining to make good the deficiency, and to elect, instead, to go into voluntary liquidation, the exercise of which would seem to be a matter in which the owners, and not the managers, of the bank primarily are interested.

[Nos. 109, 110.]

Argued December 17, 18, 1903. Decided January 18, 1904.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Oregon to review a judgment which affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in that State in favor of plaintiffs in actions upon separate demands to recover the value of stock held by them in a national bank. Affirmed.

See same case below, 41 Or. 359, 68 Pac. 806.

Statement by Mr. Justice Day:

These actions were brought in the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Multnomah county upon separate demands to recover the value of stock severally held by Weinhard and Williams in the Commercial National Bank of Portland, Oregon; Williams owning 60 shares of the par value of $6,000, and Weinhard 100 shares of the par value of $10,000. By stipulation the cases were heard together in the circuit court; a jury being waived and a trial had to the court. The cases were considered together as one appeal in the supreme court of Oregon, which affirmed the judgment of the lower court (41 Or. 359, 68 Pac. 806) assessing [244] the value of the stock, and giving *judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, now defendants in error. The same facts and questions are involved in the cases, and they will be considered together. The one question arises from a motion on the part of the bank for nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiffs below had introduced no testimony, as a part of the case in chief, tending to show the value of the stock for which a recovery was sought. As appears in the record, much testimony was taken, and the Oregon supreme court regarding the stock as of some value; at least, it was held that if there was any error in overruling the motion for nonsuit, it was cured by the subsequent action in submitting testimony as to the value of the stock. In any event, this feature of the case does not present a Federal question, and upon writ of error from the judgment of a state court we are to consider in the first instance only the Federal questions involved. If those were correctly decided the judgment must be affirmed. Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 590, 22 L. ed. 429. The plaintiffs below recovered judgment for the value of the stock upon the theory that there had been a conversion thereof, because the board of directors and the stockholders directed the assessment resulting in the sale of the stock of the plaintiffs below in satisfaction thereof.

The Commercial National Bank of Portland was duly organized under the national banking act, and carried on business in the city of Portland, Oregon. It appeared that the capital of the bank had become impaired, and thereupon such proceedings were had that on December 5, 1896, the Comptroller issued the following notice to the bank:

Treasury Department,
Office of Comptroller of the Currency,
Washington, D. C., Dec. 5, 1896.

Whereas, it appears to the satisfaction of the Comptroller of the Currency that the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank, Portland, Oregon, has become impaired to an extent which makes necessary [245] an assessment of two hundred *and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) upon the shareholders of said association to make good such deficiency:

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given to said association, under the provisions of § 5205 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3495) to pay the said deficiency in its capital stock by assessment upon its shareholders, pro rata, for the amount of the capital stock held by each, and if such deficiency shall not be paid, and said bank shall refuse to go into liquidation, as provided by law, for three months after this notice shall have been received by it, a receiver will be appointed to close up the business of the association, according to the provisions of § 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3507).

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and caused my seal of office to be affixed to these presents, at the Treasury Department, in the city of Washington, and District of Columbia, this 5th day of December, A. D. 1896.

James H. Eckels,
Comptroller of the Currency.

To the Commercial National Bank, Portland, Oregon.

After receipt of this notice, upon December 12, 1896, the board of directors passed this resolution:

"Resolved, That in accordance with the notice served upon this association by the Comptroller of the Currency, under date of December 5, 1896, and received by this bank on the 11th day of December, 1896, an assessment is hereby levied upon the shareholders of this bank of 50 per cent or $50 per share, payable at this bank on or before March 11, 1897.

"And, resolved, That the cashier of this bank be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to serve upon each shareholder of the bank a legal notice of the above assessment by sending such notice to each shareholder's address by registered mail."

Upon December 17, 1896, notice of this assessment was served upon each of the stockholders of the bank. The defendants in error having failed to pay this assessment, on *March 18, 1897, the board of directors [246] passed a resolution directing the sale of the delinquent's stock to be made at public auction on May 5, 1897. In pursuance of this order, and on the day named, the stock was sold for the amount of the assessment. The Federal question is whether the board of directors, in thus assessing and selling the stock of the defendants in error, exceeded their powers under the national banking act; it being claimed that a valid assessment could only be made by the action of the stockholders, and that the sale by the directors upon this assessment was unlawful, and amounted to a conversion of the stock.

Mr. E. S. Pillsbury argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Platt & Platt, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The general business and management of a national bank, which is defined by the national bank act to be a "body corporate," are intrusted to its board of directors.

First Nat. Bank v. National Exch. Bank, 92 U. S. 122, 23 L. ed. 679.

Within the powers of the corporation, except as expressly modified by the act under which its charter is held, the board of directors is intrusted generally with the management of the business and affairs of the bank, and its acts, done in good faith, cannot be called in question.

Dana v. Bank of United States, 5 Watts & S. 223; Hutchinson v. Green. 91 Mo. 367, 1 S. W. 853; Beveridge v. New York Elevated R. Co. 112 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 648, 19 N. E. 489.

The shareholder in a national bank, by entering into that relation, subjects himself to all the obligations created by the statute.

Studebaker v. Perry, 184 U. S. 258, 46 L. ed. 528, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 463.

The payment of an assessment to make up impaired capital is not in the nature of a further investment in the capital stock by the shareholder. His holding of stock remains the same, but has thereby cost him a greater amount; not that the investment is actually greater, in contemplation of law, than before payment, but because a part of the original investment has disappeared, and under his contract with the association the shares are to remain fully paid up. As a shareholder he becomes subject to this liability until legally relieved therefrom.

Earle v. Carson, 188 U. S. 42, 47 L. ed. 373, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254.

The bank was formed to exist and do business pursuant to the policy of the act, and not to liquidate or go into the hands of a receiver. The act contemplates that the capital of a bank may become impaired, and it is the policy of the law to have that deficiency made up. The act also expressly contemplates the continuance of business by a bank when its reserve has been impaired.

Ibid.

The levy of this assessment effected no such radical change in the management as an assignment of the property of the corporation for the benefit of creditors, which the directors might unquestionably make.

Hutchinson v. Green, 91 Mo. 375, 1 S. W. 853; De Camp v. Alward, 52 Ind. 468.

192 U. S.

The levy of assessments to meet the requirements of corporations engaged in various enterprises is a matter of such common occurrence as to require no enumeration or elaboration. Under the general rule of decision at this day these assessments, when authorized by the charter or the law under which the corporation is created, are made by the directors, although they may not be specially empowered to do so by the statute creating such corporation. This is undoubtedly so as to calls for unpaid capital.

Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 25 L. ed. 885; Ambergate R. Co. v. Mitchell, 4 Exch. 540; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 109.

The same rule should apply to the assessment in these cases, as both calls and assessments are classed together in U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5205. The terms are often used interchangeably.

Budd v. Multnomah Street R. Co. 15 Or. 413, 15 Pac. 659; Penobscot R. Co. v. Dummer, 40 Me. 172, 63 Am. Dec. 654; 2 Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 497, p. 1524.

The law gives the directors no discretion to decide whether the bank shall continue or liquidate, but it is their duty to keep the bank going until the holders of two thirds of the stock vote otherwise; the levying of an assessment is not a discretionary act on their part, if an impairment of capital has been declared by the Comptroller to exist, and the statute creates no more presumption of inability to continue business on account of such impairment than if the reserve had been reduced below the legal requirement.

Earle v. Carson, 188 U. S. 45, 47 L. ed. 375, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254.

The construction given to a statute by those charged with its execution, though not controlling, is entitled to the highest consideration of this court, and will not be overruled without cogent reasons.

United States v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760, 24 L. ed. 588; Hastings & D. R. Co. v. Whitney, 132 U. S. 357, 33 L. ed. 363, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 112.

In case of ambiguity, contemporaneous and uniform executive construction is regarded as decisive.

Brown v. United States, 113 U. S. 568, 28 L. ed. 1079, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648.

This court will take judicial notice of the rules and regulations prevailing in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and the acts of that official.

Caha v. United States, 152 U. S. 211, 38 L. ed. 415, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513; Keyser v. Hitz, 133 U. S. 138, 33 L. ed. 531, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290; Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 202, 34 L. ed. 691, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80; Heath v. Wallace, 138 U. S. 573, 34 L. ed. 1063, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 380.

As a general proposition, the powers of stockholders are more restricted than those of directors. They cannot, either separately or collectively, contract for the corporation, nor make a sale or mortgage of corporate property.

Smith v. Hurd, 12 Met. 371, 46 Am. Dec. 690; Humphreys v. McKissock, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. ed. 473, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 779; Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 91 Am. Dec. 607; Blood v. La Serena Land & Water Co. 113 Cal. 221, 45 Pac. 252; Allemong v. Simmons, 124 Ind. 199, 23 N. E. 768.

Mr. Thomas O'Day argued the cause, and, with Messrs. George H. Williams and George H. Durham, filed a brief for defendant in error:

A corporation can only be created by the sovereign power of the state, and in the creation of a corporation, such as the defendant herein, the government grants to it certain powers which are a part of the state's sovereignty. When these powers are granted, until revoked, the corporation may exercise the powers granted.

1 Thomp. Corp. § 35; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274.

The corporation can only act through such officers or agents as the grant or charter prescribes or designates.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Bank of United States v. Deveau, 5 Cranch, 61, 3 L. ed. 38.

When the acts of a corporation are challenged, it must not only appear that the corporation had the power to do the act, but the act itself must have been done in the manner and through the officers named in the charter or grant of power.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274.

While directors may, as a general rule, exercise the ordinary powers of the corporation, yet all extraordinary powers as contradistinguished from the ordinary powers of the corporation must be exercised by the shareholders alone.

Morse, Banks & Banking, § 127; Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 902; Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 136 U. S. 365, 34 L. ed. 364, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1004; Boone, Banking, §§ 83, 84, 197; Thomp. Corp. §§ 2076, 3977-3979; Brown v. Bradford, 103 Iowa, 378, 72 N. W. 648; Livesey v. Omaha Hotel Co. 5 Neb. 74.

The directors cannot give away the funds of the bank without authority from the shareholders.

Boone, Corp. § 83; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 127; Holder v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 71 Ill. 196, 22 Am. Rep. 89; Bedford R. Co. v. Bowser, 48 Pa. 29

While the directors have full power, control, and charge of the funds of the corporation, and for this reason may make an assignment for the benefit of creditors, still the directors have no power to create a fund, that being the duty of the stockholders.

2 Thomp. Corp. § 2076.

Where the legislature gives power to raise a fund in addition to the capital stock by assessment on the stockholders, the directors cannot levy such an assessment without authority from the shareholders.

Marlborough Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 2 Conn. 579.

It is essential that the terms "call" and "assessment" should not be used as synonymous terms. A "call" is for an amount due upon a subscription to stock, but an "assessment" is an amount levied upon a stockholder after his stock has been fully paid up.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 803.

When one becomes a stockholder of a corporation his relation to the corporation is that of a contract; and, if the directors could raise a fund and change the status of this contract without the consent of the stockholder, it would be giving a power to the board of directors which has been denied to the law-making power. It would allow the board of directors to change the contractual relations of the stockholder to the corporation.

United States v. Knox, 102 U. S. 422, 23 L. ed. 216.

It has been held that a board of directors has no authority to pass a by-law providing that a person who transfers his stock shall cease to be a member of the corporation.

Com. v. Gill, 3 Whart. 228.

It is also held that a board of directors invested with "all corporate powers" has no authority to accept for the corporation an amendment of its charter enlarging the powers of the corporation.

Venmer v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Fed. 581; Illinois River R. Co. v. Zimmer, 20 Ill. 654; Hope Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Beckmann, 47 Mo. 93; Com. ex rel. Claghorn v. Cullen, 13 Pa. 133, 53 Am. Dec. 450.

Nor have the directors of a railway any authority, without the consent of the shareholders, to appropriate money of the company to build a passenger depot in a state foreign to that in which it was created and one to which its lines did not extend.

Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 136 U. S. 356, 34 L. ed. 363, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1004.

Manifestly the creating of this new fund to give new life to a bank is as great a power as to create the bank in the first instance.

Hulitt v. Bell, 85 Fed. 98; Delano v. Butler, 118 U. S. 634, 30 L. ed. 260, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39.

When notice is given, the corporation ceases to exist as a bank after three months, but the stockholders may extend the life of the corporation by levying and paying the assessment on the stock; but this is clearly an act for the stockholders, and does not in any sense come within the ordinary affairs of the bank, which the directors are authorized to conduct and control.

Where words are used in a statute and given a meaning, it will be presumed that they have the same meaning at all times subsequently used.

Factors' & T. Ins. Co. v. New Harbor Protection Co. 37 La. Ann. 233; Reiche v. Smythe, 13 Wall. 162, 20 L. ed. 566.

When a notice has been received from the Comptroller of the Currency that the stock is impaired, it is the duty of the shareholders to decide whether an assessment shall be made upon the shareholders, or whether the bank shall go into liquidation; this is a matter solely for the shareholders, and not for the directors.

Hulitt v. Bell, 85 Fed. 98; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Ex parte Winsor, 3 Story, 411, Fed. Cas. No. 17,884; Delano v. Butler, 118 U. S. 634, 30 L. ed. 260, 7 Sup. Ct. So where a statute provides: "If at any time the capital stock paid into said corporation shall be impaired, by losses or otherwise, the directors shall forthwith repair the same by assessment,"—it is held that, by this statute, a personal liability is not imposed upon the stockholders, and that they cannot be assessed for the purpose of paying the creditors; that the purpose of said provision was rather to prevent the continuance of business with impaired capital.

Dewey v. St. Albans Trust Co. 57 Vt. 337; 2 Waterman, Corp. § 119, pp. 92-95.

When an assessment is for the benefit of creditors or third parties, it is made by the Comptroller alone, but where it is made to repair the capital stock, it is made by the association. The only office of the Comptroller in this respect is merely a negative one, which says to the bank: Your assets are sufficient to pay your creditors, but you cannot continue business with impaired capital stock.

Delano v. Butler, 118 U. S. 634, 30 L. ed. 260, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39.

192 U. S.

It is presumed that the assets of the bank will pay its debts, and for that reason the statute provides that, in case the assessment is not made within three months after notice, a receiver will be appointed and the assets delivered to the creditors of the bank and the surplus to the stockholders; so that when an assessment is called for under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5205, it is not for the benefit of the creditors of the bank, but merely for the purpose of keeping the bank in existence.

Dewey v. St. Albans Trust Co. 57 Vt. 337.

The object of this section is to create new capital, not in the interests of the creditors of the bank, but merely to affect its status as a going concern. The raising of this new capital is, in no respect, a part of the ordinary affairs of the bank under the control of the directors. It affects what are called "constituent matters which demand the authorization of the stockholders" in contradistinction to the "business affairs of the corporation."

Wells v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 90 Wis. 442, 64 N. W. 69; Re Sovereign Life Assur. Co. [1892] 3 Ch. 279.

The shareholder's relation to the corporation is that of a contract, affecting his property rights, which cannot be impaired without the consent of the shareholder.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This case requires the construction of § 5205 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3495). The section is as follows:

"Every association which shall have failed to pay up its capital stock, as required by law, and every association whose capital stock shall have become impaired by losses or otherwise, shall within three months after receiving notice thereof from the Comptroller of the Currency, pay the deficiency in the capital stock, by assessment upon the shareholders pro rata for the amount of capital stock held by each; and the Treasurer of the United States shall withhold the interest upon all bonds held by him in trust for any such association, upon notification from the Comptroller of the Currency, until otherwise notified by him. If any such association shall fail to pay up its capital stock, and shall refuse to go into liquidation, as *provided by law, for three[247] months after receiving notice from the Comptroller, a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association, according to the provisions of section fifty-two hundred and thirty-four (U. S. Comp.

Stat. 1901, p. 3507). [And provided, That if any shareholder or shareholders of such bank shall neglect or refuse, after three months' notice, to pay the assessment, as provided in this section, it shall be the duty of the board of directors to cause a sufficient amount of the capital stock of such shareholder or shareholders to be sold at public auction (after thirty days' notice shall be given by posting such notice of sale in the office of the bank, and by publishing such notice in a newspaper of the city or town in which the bank is located, or in a newspaper published nearest thereto) to make good the deficiency, and the balance, if any, shall be returned to such delinquent shareholder or shareholders.]”

The assessment in this case was made by the board of directors without any action of the stockholders of the association, and the defendants in error having failed to pay the same upon notice, their stock was sold as directed in the statute. It is claimed that an assessment by the directors without action of the stockholders was without authority of law, and amounted to a conversion of the stock. This view was sustained in the supreme court of Oregon. The assessment ordered by the Comptroller was for the purpose of restoring the capital of the bank and thus enabling it to continue its business. Ample power is conferred upon the Comptroller for this purpose. His action is in aid of other sections of the law preventing a withdrawal of the capital, or the making of dividends when losses have been sustained equal to the undivided profits. Sections 5202-5204, Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3494, 3495). When the notice is received from the Comptroller by the bank under § 5205, the association has no authority to review or gainsay the necessity thereof. That question is concluded by the action of the Comptroller. The money to be raised for the continuance of the business may or may not be used in the liquidation of debts. The assessment is [248] entirely different from that provided *for in § 5151 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3465), calling upon the individual responsibility of shareholders for the payment of debts. Under the last-named section the stockholder is required to pay such assessments as may be made, to meet the outstanding obligations of the bank, within the limit of an amount equal to the par value of the stock in addition to the amount invested therein. He has no election of payment, but is required to meet this liability, created by law for the benefit of creditors. Under § 5205 the amount paid is subject to the control of the board of directors in the continued operations of the bank. If the stockholders are to have a voice in making or declining to make the assessment, they may well hesitate to intrust more capital to the control of a board under whose management it has already been impaired. Certain powers are conferred by law upon the directors.

Section 5136 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3455) provides that the association shall have power—

“Sixth. To prescribe, by its board of directors, by-laws not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its stock shall be transferred, its directors elected or appointed, its officers appointed, its property transferred, its general business conducted, and the privileges granted to it by law exercised and enjoyed.

“Seventh. To exercise, by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title.”

And, again, by § 5145 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3463), it is declared that the “affairs” of the corporation “shall be managed by not less than five directors.”

Thus the directors are given authority to transact the usual and ordinary business of national banks. Obviously, the *power [249] conferred may be exercised in all usual transactions through the executive officers of the bank, without consultation with the stockholders. In the present case the question to be dealt with is vital to the continuance of the life of the association, as only by complying with the requirement of the Comptroller in assessing a sum sufficient to make up the impaired capital of the bank can its business be continued. The shareholders, by their contracts of subscription, have agreed to pay in the amount of capital stock subscribed, and to discharge the additional liability imposed by the statute. They have not contracted to meet assessments at the will of the directors to perpetuate the business of a possibly losing concern. It would be going far beyond the usual powers conferred upon directors to permit them to thus control the corporation. Corporate powers conferred upon a board of directors usually refer to the ordinary business transactions of the corporation. Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 902. The assessment is required by the Comptroller, not by the directors. The association is to receive notice thereof, and action must be taken by the association to meet the requirements of the Comptroller under the statute. It is provided that if the association fail to pay up its capital stock, and refuse to go into liquidation, as provided by law, for three months after receiving notice from the Comptroller, a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association, according to the provisions of § 5234. This important provision is entitled to much weight in determining the proper construction of the statute. The assessment may be avoided, and the amount required is not payable, if the association decides to go into liquidation. Provision for voluntary liquidation is made in § 5220 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3503), wherein authority is given to liquidate upon a vote of shareholders owning two thirds of the stock. Such liquidation does not prevent the assessment of stockholders under § 5151 for the benefit of creditors, and the enforcement of the liability of the shareholders in an action by a receiver or directly by the creditors. Rev.

[250] Stat. § 5234 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3507); § 2, act of June 30, 1876 (19 Stat. at L. 63, chap. 156), as amended, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3509. The section referred to (5234) directs the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the books, records, and assets of the association, to collect the debts and claims belonging to it, and, among other things, if necessary to pay the debts of the association, to enforce the individual liability of the shareholders.

We are of opinion that § 5205 is intended to and does confer upon the association the privilege of declining to make the assessment to make good the deficiency to the capital, and to elect instead to wind up the business of the bank under § 5220, which provides for voluntary liquidation by a vote of two thirds of the shareholders. The question is, Who shall exercise this privilege, and determine the future of the association,—is it the directors or the shareholders who have this right of decision? The origin and continuation of the association would seem to be matters in which the owners, and not the managers, of the bank are primarily interested. If these are privileges of the shareholders, and only exercisable by them, this case presents a total lack of the exertion of the power by those upon whom it is legally conferred, as no action of the shareholders was had in the present case in making the assessment. Action upon the Comptroller's order involves extraordinary action of the association, and determines its future operations or liquidation, and is not found within the powers conferred upon the directors for the management of the business of the bank. If this were not so, then the decision of a question of such vital importance is left to the directors, who may or may not be large holders of stock. As it is a matter foreign to the powers of such boards, and not conferred by statute or required for the transaction of the business of the bank, we think it was intended to be vested in the shareholders. Whether a given power is to be exercised by the directors or the shareholders depends upon its nature and the terms of the enabling act. In certain instances the law specifically requires the action of the association to be taken by its *incorporators or shareholders. Sections [251] 5133, 5134, 5136, 5143, Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3454, 3455, 3463). These sections regulate matters not pertaining to the ordinary business of the bank intrusted to the directors. They deal with the exercise of those powers which concern the organization of the corporation, the amount of its capital stock, and kindred matters.

In § 5205 the requirement of the Comptroller is that the association make the assessment. It is the "association" which is required to pay up the stock or go into liquidation. The payment of the assessments must come from the shareholders, and we are of the opinion that the statute contemplates action upon the alternatives presented in the statute by the association composed of its shareholders. It is true, as suggested by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, that it requires a two-thirds vote of the stockholders to put the bank into liquidation under § 5220; but if the assessment is not carried, and the shareholders have not a two-thirds vote favoring liquidation, the bank is put in liquidation, and the shareholders' liability is the statutory one for the benefit of creditors, and not a venture of more capital in the enterprise, with a possible stockholders' liability upon the liquidation of the bank if it shall ultimately fail. Again, if the determination of this matter is entirely left to the directors, they may, by declining to make the assessment, force a liquidation of the bank, although the shareholders—the real owners of the property—be willing to make good the impaired capital, and continue the business. On the other hand, if the directors may assess to make good impaired capital, the shareholder must pay the assessment or submit to the sale of his stock. Such extraordinary powers are far beyond those required in the management of the bank's affairs or conferred in the sections of the law defining those conferred upon the directors.

In Delano v. Butler, 118 U. S. 634, 653, 30 L. ed. 260, 265, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, 46, while the question was not directly involved, in speaking of assessments under the act, Mr. Justice Matthews, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

[252] *"The assessment imposed upon the stockholders by their own vote, for the purpose of restoring their lost capital, as a consideration for the privilege of continuing business, and to avoid liquidation under § 5205 of the Revised Statutes, is not the assessment contemplated by § 5151, by which the shareholders of every national banking association may be compelled to discharge their individual responsibility for the contracts, debts, and engagements of the association. The assessment as made under § 5205 is voluntary, made by the stockholders themselves, paid into the general funds of the bank as a further investment in the capital stock, and disposed of by its officers in the ordinary course of its business. It may or may not be applied by them to the payment of creditors, and, in the ordinary course of business, certainly would not be applied, as in cases of liquidation, to the payment of creditors ratably; whereas, under § 5151, the individual liability does not arise, except in case of liquidation, and for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the bank. The assessment under that section is made by authority of the Comptroller of the Currency, is not voluntary, and can be applied only to the satisfaction of the creditors equally and ratably."

We concur in this reasoning. The assessment under § 5205 provides for a sum to continue the operations of the bank, and if unpaid subjects the stock of the shareholders to sale to make good the deficiency in its collection. Shareholders are given the right to go into liquidation, subjecting themselves, it is true, to the liability of the assessment for the benefit of creditors under § 5151, to an amount equal to the par value of their stock, if needed to make good the indebtedness of the bank, but risking no further investment of new capital in the continued business of the bank. The choice of methods is with the shareholders, and to them is addressed the decision of the question and the making of the assessment if that course is determined upon. Hulitt v. Bell, 85 Fed. 98. In the present case the assessment was made by the directors without action by the shareholders, and, not being [253] *within the statute, was void. It follows that the supreme court of Oregon properly affirmed the judgment of the lower court in which the value of the stock sold was recovered.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERT A. CHESEBROUGH, Plff. in Err.,
v.

UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 253-264.)

Internal revenue — action to recover back stamp tax — voluntary payment — effect of application to refund.

A written application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to refund a sum expended in the voluntary purchase of revenue stamps from a collector, to be affixed to a conveyance, though it may be sufficient to justify favorable action by the commissioner, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3220 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 2086, 2087), is not the equivalent of an appeal to him from an adverse decision by the collector, which, under §§ 3226-3228 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 2088, 2089), is essential to the maintenance of a suit for the recovery of internal taxes alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected.

Argued December 3, 4, 1903. Decided January 25, 1904.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to, and dismissing, a petition to recover a sum paid to a collector of internal revenue for the purchase of stamps to be affixed to a conveyance. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Robert A. Chesebrough filed his petition in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, May 23, 1902, to recover the sum of $600 from the United States, alleged to have been paid to the collector of internal revenue for the second district of New York for the purchase of certain internal revenue stamps to be affixed to a deed for the conveyance of real estate. Petitioner alleged that on May 28, 1900, he entered into an agreement with the Chesebrough Building Company to convey to that corporation certain real estate which he then owned, and to execute and deliver a deed therefor on the 5th day of June, 1900. That on that day he made, executed, and delivered to the corporation a deed of conveyance of the real estate, and received the consideration *therefor. That at [254] the time of the execution and delivery of the deed the act of Congress of June 13, 1898, "to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," was in force, which provided in part as follows:

NOTE.—As to when taxes illegally assessed may be recovered back—see notes to Phelps v. New York, 2 L. R. A. 626; State ex rel. McCarty v. Nelson, 4 L. R. A. 300; and Erskine v. Van Arsedale, 21 L. ed. U. S. 63.

"Sec. 6. That on and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, for and in respect of the several bonds, debentures, or certificates of stock and of indebtedness, and other documents, instruments, matters, and things mentioned and described in Schedule A of this act, or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them, shall be written or printed by any person or persons, or party who shall make, sign, or issue the same, or for whose use or benefit the same shall be made, signed, or issued, the several taxes or sums of money set down in figures against the same, respectively, or otherwise specified or set forth in the said schedule."

"Schedule A.

"Conveyance: Deed, instrument, or writing, whereby any lands, tenements, or other realty sold shall be granted, assigned, transferred, or otherwise conveyed to, or vested in, the purchaser or purchasers, or any other person or persons, by his, her, or their direction, when the consideration or value exceeds one hundred dollars and does not exceed five hundred dollars, fifty cents; and for each additional five hundred dollars or fractional part thereof in excess of five hundred dollars, fifty cents."

"Sec. 7. That if any person or persons shall make, sign, or issue, or cause to be made, signed, or issued, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever, without the same being duly stamped for denoting the tax hereby imposed thereon, or without having thereupon an adhesive stamp to denote said tax, such person or persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not more than one hundred dollars, at the discretion of the court, and [255] such instrument, document, *or paper, as aforesaid, shall not be competent evidence in any court." [30 Stat. at L. 451, chap. 448, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2290.]

The petition then averred that "the Chesebrough Building Company, as was known to petitioner, was unwilling to accept the said deed of conveyance unless and until the petitioner had placed thereon the stamps required by the aforesaid act, and that petitioner, under compulsion of said law, and in order to receive from the purchaser the shares of stock named as the consideration for such conveyance, and in order to entitle such deed to be recorded under the provisions of said act, and to be received as evidence in the Federal courts, as therein provided, and in order to enable the petitioner to fulfill his aforesaid contract with said Chesebrough Building Company to make, execute, and deliver to said company a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of said real estate and premises, and in order to give to said company a good and clear title to said real estate and premises, free from doubt, did purchase from Charles H. Treat, the United States collector of internal revenue for the second district of New York, and place upon the said deed of conveyance, stamps to the amount of six hundred dollars ($600) the proceeds of sale of which stamps your petitioner believes were thereupon by said collector paid over to the United States as required by law, and said moneys are now held by the United States."

It was further averred that prior to the institution of the action, and in pursuance of the laws of the United States and the regulations of the Treasury Department in that behalf, petitioner made a written application on January 9, 1902, to the United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the refunding of the amount so paid by him for stamps as aforesaid, which application was denied. Petitioner then charged that the act was unconstitutional and void, and prayed judgment. To this petition a demurrer was filed on behalf of the United States, assigning the ground that the petition did "not state facts which would constitute a claim on the part of the claimant against the United States." The demurrer was sustained *and the petition dismissed, [256] and this writ of error was thereupon allowed.

Sections 3220, 3226, 3227, and 3228 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 2086, 2088, 2089) are as follows:

"Sec. 3220. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized, on appeal to him made, to remit, refund, and pay back all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, all penalties collected without authority, and all taxes that appear to be unjustly assessed or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected; also to repay to any collector or deputy collector the full amount of such sums of money as may be recovered against him in any court, for any internal taxes collected by him, with the costs and expenses of suit; also all damages and costs recovered against any assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, or inspector, in any suit brought against him by reason of anything done in the due performance of his official duty: Provided, That where a second assessment is made in case of a list, statement, or return which, in the opinion of the collector or deputy collector, was false or fraudulent, or contained any understatement or undervaluation, such as-assessment shall not be remitted, nor shall taxes collected under such assessment be refunded, or paid back, unless it is proved that said list, statement, or return was not false or fraudulent, and did not contain any understatement or undervaluation."

"Sec. 3226. No suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any internal tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty claimed to have been collected without authority, or of any sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected, until appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of [the] Internal Revenue, according to the provisions of law in that regard, and the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury established in pursuance thereof, and a decision of the Commissioner has been had therein: Provided, [257] That if such decision *is delayed more than six months from the date of such appeal, then the said suit may be brought, without first having a decision of the Commissioner, at any time within the period limited in the next section.

"Sec. 3227. No suit or proceeding for the recovery of any internal tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty alleged to have been collected without authority, or of any sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected, shall be maintained in any court, unless the same is brought within two years next after the cause of action accrued: Provided, That actions for such claims which accrued prior to June six, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, may be brought within one year from said date; and that where any such claim was pending before the Commissioner, as provided in the preceding section, an action thereon may be brought within one year after such decision and not after. But no right of action which was already barred by any statute on the said date shall be revived by this section.

"Sec. 3228. All claims for the refunding of any internal tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty alleged to have been collected without authority, or of any sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected, must be presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within two years next after the cause of action accrued: Provided, That claims which accrued prior to June six, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, may be presented to the Commissioner at any time within one year from said date. But nothing in this section shall be construed to revive any right of action which was already barred by any statute on that date."

Messrs. Frederic R. Coudert, Jr., and Paul Fuller argued the cause, and, with Mr. Henry M. Ward, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

A "protest" is merely satisfactory evidence that the payment was involuntary, but where the parties are not on equal terms, where one compels the payment by threats or duress, the law presumes that the payment was not made at free will.

Swift & Co. & B. Co. v. United States, 111 U. S. 22, 28, 28 L. ed. 341, 343, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244.

The provisions of the Revised Statutes for the refunding of internal revenue taxes are remedial, and therefore entitled to a most liberal construction in favor of the taxpayer.

Real Estate Sav. Bank v. United States, 16 Ct. Cl. 335.

In lieu of protest an application must be made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a refund at any time within two years from the date of payment. This is the statutory equivalent of a common-law protest or notice of suit.

Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. 137, 152, 9 L. ed. 373, 379; Erskine v. Van Arsdale, 15 Wall. 75, 77, 21 L. ed. 63, 64.

Assistant Attorney General Purdy argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

An internal revenue tax if paid "voluntarily," without "protest," or "notice of suit," could not be recovered.

Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. p. 1495; Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. 137, 152, 9 L. ed. 372, 379; Erskine v. Van Arsdale, 15 Wall. 75, 77, 21 L. ed. 63, 64.

In order to entitle a taxpayer to maintain a suit against the United States or the collector, for the recovery of such a tax, it must appear that the tax was paid under protest, or with notice of suit.

Chatham v. United States, 92 U. S. 85, 88, 23 L. ed. 561, 562; Wright v. Blakeslee, 101 U. S. 178, 25 L. ed. 1049.

There must be such a thing as a voluntary payment of an internal revenue tax.

Schmitt v. Trowbridge, 3 Cin. Law Bull. 1029, Fed. Cas. No. 12,468; Stewart v. Barnes, 153 U. S. 456, 38 L. ed. 781, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849; Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 554, 39 L. ed. 809, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The rule is firmly established that taxes voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, and payments with knowledge and without compulsion are voluntary. At the same time, when taxes are paid under protest that they are being illegally exacted, or with notice that the payer contends that they are illegal, and intends to institute suit to compel their repayment, a recovery in such a suit may, on occasion, be had, although generally speaking, even a protest or notice will not avail if the payment be made voluntarily, with full knowledge of all the circumstances, and without any coercion by the actual or threatened exercise of power possessed, or supposed to be possessed, by the party exacting or receiving the payment, over the person or property of the party making the payment. from which the latter has no other means of immediate *relief than such payment. Little v. Bowers, 134 U. S. 547, 554, 33 L. ed. 1016, 1019, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620; Union P. R. Co. v. Dodge County, 98 U. S. 541, 544, 25 L. ed. 196, 197; Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 24 L. ed. 409, citing Brumagin v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 79 Am. Dec. 176, a case in respect of stamps purchased, in which the subject is discussed by Mr. Justice Field, then chief justice of California.

In Union P. R. Co. v. Dodge County, Mr. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, said:

"There are, no doubt, cases to be found in which the language of the court, if separated from the facts of the particular case under consideration, would seem to imply that a protest alone was sufficient to show that the payment was not voluntary; but on examination it will be found that the protest was used to give effect to the other attending circumstances. Thus, in Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. 137, 9 L. ed. 373, and Bend v. Hoyt, 13 Pet. 266, 10 L. ed. 155, which were customs cases, the payments were made to release goods held for duties on imports; and the protest became necessary, in order to show that the legality of the demand was not admitted when the payment was made. The recovery rested upon the fact that the payment was made to release property from detention, and the protest saved the rights which grew out of that fact. In Philadelphia v. The Collector, 5 Wall. 730, 18 L. ed. 616, and The Collector v. Hubbard, 12 Wall. 13, 20 L. ed. 276, which were internal revenue tax cases, the actions were sustained 'upon the ground that the several provisions in the internal revenue acts referred to warranted the conclusion as a necessary implication that Congress intended to give the taxpayer such remedy.' It is so expressly stated in the last case, p. 14, L. ed. 276. As the case of Erskine v. Van Arsdale, 15 Wall. 75, 21 L. ed. 63, followed these, and was of the same general character, it is to be presumed that it was put upon the same ground. In such cases the protest plays the same part it does in customs cases, and gives notice that the payment is not to be considered as admitting the right to make the demand."

The stamps in question were purchased from the collector of internal revenue for the second district of New York, for the *pur-[261] pose of affixing them to a deed of conveyance to the building company, but the collector was not informed at the time of the purchase of the particular purpose, and no intimation was given him, written or oral, that petitioner claimed that the law requiring such stamps was unconstitutional, and that he was making the purchase under duress. The petition did allege that the building company was unwilling to accept an unstamped conveyance, and that the stamps were thereupon affixed in order to complete the transaction and obtain the consideration, but if that constituted duress as between Chesebrough and his building company it was a matter with which the collector had nothing to do. On the face of the petition the purchase was purely voluntary and made under mutual mistake of law if the law were unconstitutional. But it is said that protest or notice would have made this payment involuntary, and that because something over nineteen months after the payment petitioner made "a written application" to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the amount he had paid for the stamps, the ordinary rule did not apply, inasmuch as such an application was "the statutory equivalent of a common-law protest or notice of suit."

The reference is to § 3220 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on appeal to him, may remit, refund, and pay back all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or that appear to have been unjustly assessed or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected; and also "repay to any collector or deputy collector the full amount of such sums of money as may be recovered against him in any court, for any internal taxes collected by him, with the cost and expenses of suit;" while §§ 3226, 3227, and 3228 provide that no suit shall be maintained for the recovery of internal taxes alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected "until appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue;" or unless brought within two years after the cause *of action accrued; and that the claim[262] for refunding shall be presented to the Commissioner within two years.

The words "until appeal shall have been duly made," appear to us to imply an adverse decision by the collector, at least a compelled payment, or official demand for payment, from which the appeal is taken.

In Stewart v. Barnes, 153 U. S. 456, 38 L. ed. 781, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849, this court treated the language as providing for "an appeal," and we think correctly. The opinion considered § 19 of the act of July 13, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 152, chap. 184 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2088), carried forward into § 3226, and § 44 of the act of June 6, 1872, 17 Stat. at L. 257, chap. 315 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2089), from which §§ 3227 and 3228 were drawn. We give them in the margin.†

[263] *This petition did not set up any ruling of the collector, either specific or resulting from a demand to which petitioner yielded under protest or with notice, and from which he appealed to the Commissioner, but averred that he "made a written application" to the Commissioner to refund the amount he had paid.

We do not say that this was not sufficient to justify action by the Commissioner, but the averment as it stands is not equivalent to stating a previous adverse decision appealed from. The inference is that the application was a mere afterthought, and if an afterthought, the payment was voluntary.

The Commissioner might nevertheless have allowed the claim, and doubtless would have done so, in the interest of justice, if there were no particular circumstances to discredit it, and the law had been held unconstitutional by this court. But he rejected it, and petitioner was remitted to his suit in no different plight, so far as his cause of action was concerned, that if he had not sought the Commissioner at all.

In United States v. Real Estate Sav. Bank, 104 U. S. 728, 26 L. ed. 908, it was held that the allowance of a claim by the Commissioner was equivalent to an account stated between private parties, and binding on the United States until impeached for fraud or mistake, and that if not paid on proper application through the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, an action might be maintained on it in the court of claims; while if the claim were rejected, an action might be prosecuted against the collector. It was not, however, ruled that in the latter situation a recovery could be had if the original payment had been voluntary and without objection.

It is one thing for the government to correct mistakes, return overcharges, or refund amounts exacted without authority, when satisfied such action is due to justice, and quite another thing for the government to be compelled to repay amounts which, in its view, have been lawfully collected.

By § 3220 authority is given and opportunity afforded to do what justice and right are found to require, and the conditions which govern contested litigation may well be regarded *as waived; but it does not fol- [264] low that there is any statutory waiver of such conditions when the government is proceeded against in invitum.

As we have said, the purchase of these stamps was purely voluntary, and if, notwithstanding, recovery could be had, it could only be on protest or notice, and there was none such here, written or verbal, formal or informal.

It is argued that the provision of § 3220 for the repayment of judgments against the collector rendered protest or notice unnecessary for his protection; but it was clearly demanded for the protection of the government in conducting the extensive business of dealing in stamps, which were sold and delivered in quantities, and without it there would not be the slightest vestige of involuntary payment in transactions like that under consideration. And we find no

[265]*SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Petitioner,
v.

HERMAN CRAMER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 265-286.)

Patents — primary invention — vertical double brace as support for sewing-machine treadle — construction of claim — infringement.

1. The devising of means for utilizing a vertical double or cross brace cast in one piece as a support for a sewing-machine treadle cannot be deemed to have involved such an exercise of the inventive faculty as to make the Cramer patent, No. 271,426, for a new and improved sewing-machine treadle, a primary one, and entitle the patentee to a liberal construction of his claim, where, at the time of his alleged invention, a vertical cross brace and a lower cross brace or the rod were common adjuncts of sewing machines, and it was customary to support the lower cross rod or brace in the web of the legs of sewing machines, and to utilize the legs as bearings, and the employment of solid castings as bearings or supports for oscillating shafts where a fixed alignment was essential was a well-known method of machine construction.
2. The claim of the Cramer patent, No. 271,426, for the use in combination of a vertical double brace and a sewing-machine treadle provided with trunnions fitted to oscillate in such brace on bearings therein "substantially as specified," must be deemed to cover only elements in combination having substantially the form and constructed substantially as described in the final specifications and shown in the accompanying drawing, where the Patent Office, after twice refusing to allow the patent because of certain prior patents, evidently was led to take favorable action because of the peculiar form of the described bearing when situated in a vertical cross brace, such as was shown in the drawing, with the described accessories.
3. No infringement of the claim of the Cramer patent, No. 271,426, for the use, in combination, of a vertical double brace and a sewing-machine treadle fitted to oscillate in the brace on bearings therein "substantially as specified," results from the employment of the device covered by the Diehl patent, No. 306,

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of California entered on a verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the infringement of a patent. Reversed, and remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial.

See same case below, 48 C. C. A. 588, 109 Fed. 652.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

This controversy relates to an alleged infringement by the petitioner, a New Jersey corporation, of United States letters patent No. 271,426, issued to the respondent on January 30, 1883, for "a new and improved sewing-machine treadle." For convenience the petitioner will be hereafter referred to as the Singer Company and the respondent as Cramer.

The treadle device used by the Singer company on its sewing machines, which it was charged infringed the Cramer patent, was covered by letters patent No. 306,469, dated October 14, 1884, issued to the Singer company as the assignee of one Diehl.

The file wrapper and contents exhibit the following proceedings in the Patent Office respecting the Cramer patent: The *original [266] application was filed on May 25, 1882, and was for the grant of letters patent to Cramer "as the inventor for the invention set forth in the annexed specification." The specification and oath thereto read as follows:

"I, Herman Cramer, of the city of Sonoma, in Tuolumne county, in the state of California, have invented certain improvements in a treadle, to be used in sewing machines, or other machinery where a noiseless treadle may be required, of which the following is a specification:

"My invention consists of the usual platform marked 'A' in Fig. 1 of diagram on treadle bar. The ends of said treadle bar, marked 'B,' are shaped like the letter V, and rest in socket in lower end of a brace 'C,' the socket being  shaped, the brace 'C' cast in one piece, and the treadle bar and platform on the bar is also cast in one piece.

"The treadle bar rests in socket in brace 'C,' which is immediately above a cross brace usually in machines to keep them from spreading apart, the nut on end of cross brace is marked 'D.' Letter 'M' immediately beneath cross brace and treadle bar is an oil receiver to retain any drippings of oil from the bearings of treadle bar.

"My invention consists in having the ends of the treadle bar V-shaped to fit in hole in brace 'C,' also  shaped to receive the ends of the treadle bar.

"This V-shaped treadle bar in brace 'C' entirely prevents noise from the treadle, is self-adjusting, and does away with the necessity of cones and set screws now in use. This I claim as my invention. Fig. 1 represents platform 'A' and treadle bar, the ends of which are V-shaped and marked 'B.'

"Fig. 2 represents the lower end of brace 'C' with hole  shaped to receive the ends of treadle bar 'B.' 'D' represents nut on end of cross brace immediately below treadle bar.

"State of California, }
County of Tuolumne. }

[267] "Herman Cramer, the above-named petitioner, being duly *sworn, deposes and says that he verily believes himself to be the original and first inventor of the improvement in a noiseless self-adjusting treadle described in the foregoing specification, that he does not know and does not believe that the same was ever before known or used, and that he is a citizen of the United States."

The application was referred to the examiner, who, on May 29, 1882, wrote to Cramer, in care of his attorneys, as follows:

"The application is not prepared in conformity with the rules of the office. The specification is written on both sides of the pages, while the rules direct that it should be written on one side of each page only.

"No claim is appended to the specification. The oath is incomplete, as § 39 of the rules requires applicants to state under the oath if the invention has been patented to them, or with their knowledge and consent to others in any foreign country, and, if so, the number, date, and place of such patent or patents. Reference is made to the patent to G. W. Gregory, No. 256,563, April 18, 1882, which exhibits the alleged invention."

On August 3, 1882, the following substitute specification, concluding with an oath similar to that appended to the prior specification, was sent to the Patent Office:

"I, Herman Cramer, of the city of Sonora, in Tuolumne county, in the state of California, have invented certain improvements in a treadle and brace, to be used in sewing machines or other machinery where a noiseless treadle may be required, of which the following is a specification:

"My invention consists in a combination of the usual platform marked 'A,' in Fig. 1 of diagram on treadle bar. The ends of said treadle bar marked 'B' are to bear against mufflers.

"The treadle-bar bearings are in and on brace 'C.' The treadle bar rests in socket in brace 'C,' which is immediately above a cross bar usually in machines to keep them from spreading apart.

*"The nut on end of cross bar is marked [268] 'D.' Letter 'M,' immediately beneath cross bar, and treadle bar, is an oil receiver to retain any drippings of oil from the bearings of treadle bar.

"The treadle bar, mufflers, and brace 'C' are held between the right and left legs of the machine by means of a brace bar underneath the treadle bar.

"This brace and socket or bearing in or on brace is in one piece.

"The treadle bar with mufflers on the ends, working or bearing in or on brace, entirely prevents noise from the treadle, is self-adjusting, and does away with the necessity for cones and set screws now in use.

"Fig. 1 represents platform 'A' and treadle bar, the ends of which may be V-shaped, or any shape to suit, marked 'B.'

"Fig. 2 represents the lower end of brace 'C.'

"'D' represents nut on end of cross bar immediately below the treadle bar.

"What I claim is a combination of brace 'C' with socket or bearing in it or on it, to receive the treadle bar with the mufflers at the ends of treadle bar or in or on brace 'C' in connection with said brace 'C,' and the treadle bar in connection with brace 'C,' and mufflers to work in or on brace 'C,' substantially as set forth."

On August 14, 1882, the examiner wrote Cramer, in care of his attorneys, as follows:

"Applicant's amended claims are met by the patent to J. E. Donovan, June 28, 1881, No. 243,529, in view of which a patent is again refused."

Following this rejection there was filed a revocation of the power of attorney which had been executed by Cramer in favor of the attorneys who had theretofore conducted the proceedings, and an appointment of other attorneys for the further prosecution of the application. On October 17, 1882,, the substituted attorneys sent to the Patent Office a new drawing and an amendment of the specification on file, which amendment consisted in canceling all the specification ex-

[269]cept the *signature and substituting for the matter so stricken out the following:

"Be it known that I, Herman Cramer, of Sonora, in the county of Tuolumne and state of California, have invented a new and improved sewing-machine treadle; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear, and exact description of the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawing, forming part of this specification.

"My invention relates to improvements in the bearings of sewing-machine treadles, and it has for its object to provide means, first, to keep the treadle bearings rigidly in line and at a fixed distance apart to avoid friction, and second, to make its movement in use noiseless. To this end my invention consists in the construction and combination of parts hereinafter fully described and claimed, reference being had to the accompanying drawings in which—

"Fig. 1 is a perspective view of a portion of a sewing machine showing my invention.

"Fig. 2 is a transverse vertical section through one bearing of the treadle.

"A represents the treadle provided with the usual pitman connection by which to run the sewing-machine wheel. B represents the two trunnions cast as a portion of the treadle and extending from its sides into loopholes in the common cast-iron cross brace C. These trunnions are sharpened to an edge or corner along their lower sides, and the lower end of the loophole is hollowed to an angle more obtuse than the edge of the trunnion, to serve as a bearing for the same and permit the rocking motion common to treadles.

"C represents the usual cast-iron double brace connecting the two end legs diagonally in a plane generally vertical. The lower ends of this brace are secured directly to the web of the legs by bolts d, and for convenience and strength I make the two ends of the common cross bar D serve as these bolts. The upper ends of the brace are secured as usual, either to the web of the legs or to the table of the machine near the legs.

[270] *—"The treadle and its trunnion bearings are wholly independent of the cross bar D, except its service as stated, to hold the brace to the legs. The bearing holes in the brace are formed into long vertical loops to permit the entrance of the treadle.

"Pieces of leather F, or other soft material, cover the top and end of each trunnion to serve as cushions to keep the same close in its bearing, to prevent the noise which would result were the trunnions permitted to bounce and thump endways, when the treadle is in motion. The leather F is fitted to the curve of the upper side of the trunnion, which is an arc of a cylinder, whose center of oscillation is the lower edge of the trunnion; the same leather also interposes between the end of the trunnion and the adjacent iron. f is a block serving as a mere backer to which the cushion F is attached. This block conforms to the back and top side of the cushion and fills the loophole in the brace above the trunnion. It also has tangs or projections e, resting in suitable recesses in the brace C, which are held between the brace and the web of the leg E, by which means the block and cushion are held in place. Below the bearings of the trunnions B, I provide cups, M, attached to the ends of brace C, to catch the oil that usually drips from such bearings.

"By this construction my treadle bearings are rigidly fixed and in no way liable to get out of line or to require adjustment; the usual noise is prevented, and overflowing of oil is caught before it can do damage.

"I am aware that sewing-machine treadles have before been provided with V-shaped bearings, and I do not claim the same as my invention; but—

"What I claim and wish to secure by letters patent is—

"1. The vertical double brace joining the legs of the two ends of a sewing machine, provided with holes through its lower extremities to serve as bearings, in combination with a treadle provided with trunnions fitted to oscillate in said bearings, substantially as specified.

*"2. The sewing-machine legs E, the vertical [271] double brace C secured thereto and provided with holes to serve as bearings for the treadle A, and the treadle provided with trunnions B to oscillate in said bearings, in combination with the cushion F and the block f, as and for the purpose specified."

Accompanying the new specification was the following communication, signed by the attorney:

"A new oath is herewith filed. Gregory, referred to, pivots the grooved trunnions of his treadle upon knife edges secured within the upper loops of two collars, which are secured to the cross bar by means of set screws to keep them from turning. Donovan pivots his treadle upon its trunnions having sharpened edges, in grooves in the cross bar, where it is held by collars provided with flanges projecting over the trunnions. Applicant pivots his treadle upon the sharpened edges of its trunnions in loop holes in the two ends of the brace which is bolted to the legs of the machine by the two ends of the cross bar. This service of the cross bar might be as well performed by two short bolts: but, the bar being a usual cross tie to stiffen the legs, applicant uses its ends as bolts to hold his brace ends to the legs. We have rewritten the specification to elucidate the inventor's claim. Should the case meet with favorable consideration a new drawing will be furnished. For the purpose of examination, see pencil sketch on sheet of drawing filed."

On October 19, 1882, the examiner wrote Cramer, in care of his attorney, as follows:

"The case has been reconsidered in connection with the substituted specification filed the 17th inst., and the examiner holds that the references previously cited—that of Gregory in particular—meets the alleged invention. The case is accordingly rejected."

To this letter the following reply was made by the attorneys for Cramer:

"The examiner will please notice that applicant's invention places both bearings of the treadle in the cross brace.

"By this means they may be made perfectly true in line, *either by casting or drilling, and they cannot be thrown out of line, either by use, or by the most awkward setting up.

"Therefore, one source of friction is avoided. All the references have shown bearings made of two separate pieces which could readily be set up out of line, or even be worked loose. The advantage is obvious.

A reconsideration is respectfully asked."

This closed the correspondence. Soon afterwards notification was given that the patent had been allowed, and letters patent embodying the specification last above set forth, headed "Treadle for sewing machines," etc., were issued, bearing date January 30, 1883. The following is a fac simile of the drawing referred to in the specification:

on the following fac simile of the first sheet of the drawing attached to the Diehl patent:

In this specification Diehl declared his invention to consist in "certain new and useful improvements in sewing-machine stands and treadles;" and the object to be "to secure a permanent and reliable support and adjustment for both the band wheel and treadle, and to preserve their respective relative positions, so that they will always co-operate to produce the best results with the least danger of friction or binding." The claims were five in number, as follows:

"1. In a sewing-machine stand, a cross brace having supports for both the band wheel and the treadle integral with said brace.

"2. In a sewing-machine stand, a cross brace having supports for both the band wheel and the treadle integral with *said brace, and provided also with means for adjusting and taking up the wear of such band wheel and treadle.

"3. In a sewing-machine stand, a cross brace adapted to connect the legs or side pieces thereof, provided at one side with bearings for the fly-wheel crank shaft, and having a support at its base for the treadle, substantially as set forth.

"4. The combination, with the cross brace of a sewing-machine stand, of a crank shaft and a treadle, both mounted in the said brace, substantially as set forth.

"5. A cross brace for sewing-machine stands, having at its base a cross bar, combined with a treadle mounted in said cross bar, substantially as set forth."

To recover damages for alleged infringement of the first claim of the Cramer patent,

The alleged infringing device is delineated in the use by the Singer company of the Diehl device just referred to, Cramer brought this action at law against the Singer company on October 8, 1896, in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California. By amendment of the declaration the recovery was limited to damages sustained by infringements committed within the northern district of California. In the answer filed on behalf of the Singer company,—in addition to excepting to the jurisdiction of the court and pleading as res judicata a former judgment rendered in favor of the defendant in an action brought by Cramer against one Fry, an employee of the Singer company (68 Fed. 201),—defenses were interposed of want of novelty and utility and lack of invention, and infringement was denied.

A trial was had which resulted (by direction of the court, sustaining the plea of res judicata) in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. This judgment was reversed by the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. 35 C. C. A. 508, 93 Fed. 636. On a second trial a verdict was rendered for Cramer and judgment was entered thereon for the sum of $12,456. On appeal this judgment was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. 48 C. C. A. 588, 109 Fed. 652. A writ of certiorari was thereafter allowed by this court.

Messrs. Charles C. Linthicum and Charles K. Offield argued the cause and filed a brief for petitioner:

The construction of a patent is solely a matter of law for the court.

Hald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 737, 26 L. ed. 910.

In all cases where the claim is for an improvement on a machine, it will be incumbent upon the patentee to show the extent of his improvement, so that a person understanding the subject may comprehend distinctly in what it consists.

Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. 454, 4 L. ed. 433.

A failure on the part of the patentee in those prerequisites of the act which authorize a patent is a bar to a recovery in an action for its infringement, and the validity of this defense does not depend on the invention of the inventor, but is a legal inference upon his conduct.

Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. 248, 8 L. ed. 386.

Where the ingredients are all old, the invention in such a case consists entirely in the combination, and the requirement of the patent act that the invention shall be fully and exactly described applies with as much force to such an invention as to any other class, because if not fulfilled all three of the great ends intended to be accomplished by that requirement would be defeated.

Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. 25, 22 L. ed. 710.

A question of infringement is best determined by the court by comparison.

Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. 517, 20 L. ed. 33; McCormick v. Talcott, 20 How. 409, 15 L. ed. 932.

In patents for combination of mechanism, limitations and provisos imposed by the inventor—especially such as were introduced into an application after it had been persistently rejected—must be strictly construed against the inventor and in favor of the public, and looked upon as in the nature of disclaimers.

Sargent v. Hall Safe & Lock Co. 114 U. S. 86, 29 L. ed. 76, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1021.

A comparison of the patent as granted, with the application, very conclusively establishes the limits within which the patentee's claims must be confined.

Sutter v. Robinson, 119 U. S. 540, 30 L. ed. 492, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376.

The patentee, as to an improvement or patentable combination, before he can expect to extend his patent or claim beyond substantially the form and statement of construction shown and described in his patent for such improvement or combination, must so indicate and express in his patent.

Under the construction for the Cramer patent, contended for by his counsel, such patent represents a mere aggregation, and not a patentable combination.

Wright v. Yuengling, 155 U. S. 47-53, 39 L. ed. 64-66, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

The patent manufactured and justified under is prima facie evidence of the truth of the facts asserted in it, and prima facie evidence that the device manufactured under such patent is not an infringement of a previously granted patent sued upon.

The theory of the patentee and his opinion as to his invention are of no consequence upon the question of infringement.

Foss v. Herbert, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 4,957.

The act of infringement is a tort or wrong, and the burden of proof is always upon the plaintiff, and is never shifted to establish such fact of infringement.

Westinghouse v. Boyden Power Brake Co. 170 U. S. 561, 42 L. ed. 1145, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707, contains the most recent, clear, and conclusive statement and argument of this court upon the question of pioneer patents, and is peculiarly applicable to the facts in this case.

Mr. John H. Miller argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent:

The petitioner in this proceeding must make out a very strong case before it can hope to persuade this court that the learned judge of the lower court should have peremptorily ordered the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, and thereby deprive Cramer of his constitutional right to a trial by jury.

Patents for inventions are not to be treated as mere monopolies, and therefore odious in the eyes of the law, but are to receive a liberal construction, and, under the fair application of the rule, Ut res magis valeat quam pereat, are, if practicable, to be so interpreted as not to destroy the right of the inventor.

Turrill v. Michigan S. & N. S. R. Co. 1 Wall. 510, 17 L. ed. 672.

A patent should be construed in a liberal spirit to sustain the just claims of the inventor. This principle is not to be carried so far as to exclude what it is, or to interpolate anything which it does not contain. But liberality, rather than strictness, should prevail where the fate of a patent is involved, and the question to be decided is whether the inventor shall hold or lose the fruits of his genius and labors.

Union Paper-Bag Mach. Co. v. Murphy, 97 U. S. 120, 24 L. ed. 935.

Mr. Justice White, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

Sixty-eight exceptions were taken by the Singer company during the trial of the action in the circuit court, and were pressed upon the attention of the circuit court of appeals in sixty-nine assignments of error. These exceptions were all in effect relied upon in the argument at bar; but from the view we take of the case it is unnecessary to consider and decide any other assignment than that based upon the exception to the refusal of the court, at the close of all the evidence, to instruct a verdict for the defendant on the ground that "no infringement whatever had been shown." As in each of the patents in question it is apparent from the face of the instrument that extrinsic evidence is not needed to explain terms of art therein, or to apply the descriptions to the subject-matter, and as we are able, from mere comparison, to comprehend what are the inventions described in each patent, and, from such comparison, to determine whether or not the Diehl device is an infringement upon that of Cramer, the question of infringement or no infringement is one of law, and susceptible of determination on this writ of error. Heald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 737, 26 L. ed. 910; Market Street Cable R. Co. v. Rowley, 155 U. S. 621, 625, 39 L. ed. 284, 287, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224.

Whether error was committed in refusing to direct a verdict is, then, the question to be decided. The claims of the Cramer patent are two in number, and read as follows:

"1. The vertical double brace joining the legs of the two ends of a sewing machine, provided with holes through its lower extremities to serve as bearings, in combination with a treadle provided with trunnions fitted to oscillate in said bearings, substantially as specified.

[276] "2. The sewing-machine legs E, the vertical double brace C secured thereto and provided with holes to serve as bearings for the treadle A, and the treadle provided with trunnions B to oscillate in said bearings, in combination with the cushion F and the block f, as and for the purpose specified."

Infringement is charged only in respect to the first claim. In substance, the contention for Cramer is that the conception or idea of the practicability and desirability of utilizing a vertical double brace as a support for a sewing-machine treadle was new with Cramer, and the combination devised by him produced such new and useful results, and exhibited such an exercise of the inventive faculty, as to cause the patent to be a pioneer, and, therefore, entitle the patentee to demand that the claim of the patent should be broadly and liberally construed. For the Singer company it is contended that the availability of use of a vertical cross brace as a support for a sewing-machine treadle was apparent to any person possessing ordinary mechanical skill, that the invention in question if patentable was in no just sense one of a primary nature, and that the combination described by Cramer is to be restricted narrowly to the mere details of the mechanism described as constituting the combination. We must first determine which of these contentions is correct.

Discussing the significance of the term "pioneer" as applied to a patented invention, this court, in Westinghouse v. Boyden Power Brake Co. 170 U. S. 537, 43 L. ed. 1136, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707, said (p. 561, L. ed. p. 1145, Sup. Ct. Rep. p. 718):

"To what liberality of construction these claims are entitled depends to a certain extent upon the character of the invention, and whether it is what is termed in ordinary parlance a 'pioneer.' This word, although used somewhat loosely, is commonly understood to denote a patent covering a function never before performed, a wholly novel device, or one of such novelty and importance as to mark a distinct step in the progress of the art, as distinguished from a mere improvement or perfection of what had gone before. Most conspicuous examples of such patents are: The one to Howe of the sewing machine; *to Morse of the electrical tele- [277] graph; and to Bell of the telephone. The record in this case would indicate that the same honorable appellation might be safely bestowed upon the original air brake of Westinghouse, and perhaps, also, upon his automatic brake. In view of the fact that the invention in this case was never put into successful operation, and was to a limited extent anticipated by the Boyden patent of 1883, it is, perhaps, an unwarrantable extension of the term to speak of it as a 'pioneer,' although the principle involved subsequently and through improvements upon this invention became one of great value to the public."

To ascertain whether the patented invention of Cramer is entitled to be embraced within the term "pioneer" as just defined, we will consider it in connection with the state of the art.

In the history of the art it is unquestioned that, long prior to the application by Cramer for the grant of the patent in question, devices similar to the vertical cross brace C and the lower cross bar or tie rod D, shown in the drawing of the Cramer patent, were commonly employed in sewing machines. This is conceded by Cramer in statements made in the progress of his application through the Patent Office. Thus, in the specification which forms a part of the patent the vertical brace C is referred to (italics not in original) as "the common cast-iron brace C," and "the usual cast-iron double brace;" while in the first of the proposed specifications, as well as in that which was finally adopted, the lower bar or tie rod D is referred to (italics not in original) as "the common cross brace or cross bar." And in both the first and second specifications the usual purpose subserved in sewing machines by this cross bar was "to keep them (the machines) from spreading apart." It is, of course, obvious that such was also the purpose of the employment of the vertical double or cross brace.

The vertical double cross brace C, as shown in the Cramer drawing, is a solid piece of casting. But it is also an undisputed fact that, long prior to the alleged invention of Cramer, it was a well-known method of construction when revolving *or [278] oscillating shafts were to be placed in bearings or supports, to have both bearings or supports of such shafts attached to a solid metal casting. Instances of such practices, testified to by witnesses, may be referred to. One was a device to hold a saw mandrel or saw arbor, the former being cast in one piece for the purpose of connecting both journals of the arbor to keep it in absolute line. Another device is the head stock of an ordinary engine lathe or machine lathe, where, in order to have a proper working machine, it is absolutely necessary that the shaft bearings shall be in exact alignment with each other, and firmly in one place. Still another illustrative device employed for a great many years is embodied in a high-speed engine. So, also, in the sewing-machine art, as evidenced by the Wilcox patent No. 106,242 of date August 9, 1870, to be hereafter noticed, the legs of sewing machines had long before Cramer's application been used as bearings for treadle bars, the bearings being cored out of the leg castings.

A vertical cross brace and a lower cross brace or tie rod being common adjuncts of sewing machines at the time of Cramer's alleged invention, and it being also customary to support the lower cross rod or brace in the web of the legs of sewing machines and to utilize the legs as bearings, and it being old in machinery to employ solid castings as bearings or supports for oscillating shafts where a fixed alignment was essential, we readily conclude that there was no merit in the mere conception or idea that a vertical double brace was capable of being advantageously utilized as bearings for sewing-machine treadles, and that the devising of means for so utilizing such a brace did not involve such an exercise of the inventive faculty as entitled Cramer to assert in himself a right to claim a patent broadly for the use in combination of a vertical double brace and a sewing-machine treadle. In view of this, and of the fact that the principal elements of the Cramer combination were old, we hold that the Cramer patent was not a primary one, and that it is not, therefore, entitled to receive the broad construction which has been claimed for it. Let us, therefore,

[279]*examine the first claim of the patent in connection with the proceedings in the Patent Office anterior to the allowance of the patent, in order to fix its precise import, as a preliminary to considering whether, as correctly construed, it is infringed by the Singer appliance. The claim reads as follows:

"The vertical double brace joining the legs of the two ends of a sewing machine, provided with holes through its lower extremities to serve as bearings, in combination with a treadle provided with trunnions fitted to oscillate in said bearings, substantially as specified."

In the first specification sent to the Patent Office, the object sought to be attained is declared to be the elimination of the noise caused by the operation of a loose treadle, whether used in sewing machines or other machinery. The applicant evidently had in mind treadles which oscillated upon rigid bars and rested on cone bearings or analogous supports, attached to the rigid bars by set screws,—such bearings needing adjustment from time to time as the friction of the parts from the operation of the treadle caused wear and looseness of the parts. It was recited that the treadle bar and the platform on such bar (i. e., the foot rest) was to be cast as one piece. The invention was declared to consist "in having the ends of the treadle bar V-shaped to fit in hole in brace C, also heart shaped to receive the ends of the treadle bar."

The application based upon this first specification was rejected, as mentioned in the statement of facts, upon a reference to the patent to G. W. Gregory, No. 256,563, April 18, 1882, which the examiner stated exhibited "the alleged invention." Gregory termed his invention "an improvement in treadle supports for sewing machines." It is illustrated in the following fac simile of one of the figures of the drawing of the patent:

The invention consisted in attaching to the lower cross bar or rod of a sewing machine two devices styled collars, each collar having two circular openings, one above the other. The upper opening contained a V-shaped bearing. The cross bar was fitted into the lower opening. The treadle or foot rest was provided on each side with short projections termed ears, which fitted on the V-shaped bearings in the upper portion of each collar. The specification contained the following statement:

"I am aware that V-shaped or scale bearings are old in connection with the sewing-machine treadles,—as, for instance, a long rod to which the treadle is secured has been provided at its ends in the set frames of the machine stand with V-shaped bearings."

At the close of the descriptive portion of the specification it was further stated:

"I am aware that sewing-machine treadles have had V-shaped bearings, as in United States patent Nos. 148,759 and 106,242; but neither of said patents shows a bearing constructed in accordance with my invention."

No. 106,242 was a patent granted to C. H. Willeox on August 9, 1870. It covers the following device:

Fig. 1.

The device shows the character of treadle support now employed in the Willeox & Gibbs sewing machine. The stand is devoid of a vertical cross brace, the legs of the machine being braced near the bottom by the ordinary cross bar or tie rod. Just above this rod is exhibited the invention, being a "rockshaft B, beveled at the ends, and provided with V-shaped bearings b, extending to the center of motion of the rockshaft B, and supported in a V-shaped bearing seat a, in combination with a treadle movement." Elsewhere in the specification the bearings or supports in legs of the machine to receive the ends of the rockshaft B are referred to as "V-shaped bearings." The statement is also made that "the bar is prevented from having any undue lateral movement by the washers upon the ends of the tie rod c, which holds the lower part of the frame together." An alternate mode of construction of the bearings to support the rockshaft was thus described (italics not in original):

"The V-shaped seat of the bearings a may be formed of a separate piece of hard metal let into a groove in the frame, or otherwise applied to it, and the ends b may be formed also of *a piece of hard metal, so that the wear of the parts in contact will be very slight, and all rattling or loose jarring motions entirely prevented."

Although the first refusal to allow a patent was made on May 29, 1882, it was not until August 3 following that the attorneys for Cramer transmitted an amended application to the Patent Office. In the substituted specification the object to be attained is stated as in the previous specification. An addition to the combination was made, however, in the use of what were styled "mufflers," against which it was said the ends of the treadle bars were to bear. A patent was again refused, however, the examiner noting that "applicant's amended claims are met by the patent to J. E. Donovan, June 28, 1881, No. 243,529."

The drawing of the Donovan patent exhibits a sewing-machine stand containing a vertical double brace. One form of treadle bar constituting a part of the invention was represented as situated just below the vertical cross brace, and as having a rounded edge, supported in V-shaped bearings, in the legs or sides of the frame. A shoulder was indicated on each end of the bar, and a substitute device was also shown called a button fastener, which was to be attached from the outside of the frame to meet the end of the bar. It was said in the specification that the treadle bar might be made of cast iron and cast on and with the treadle. It was further stated (italics not in original):

"The bearing supports are preferably made by coring out the frame in the manner shown in the drawings. It is obvious that other forms of supporting these bearings may be provided."

Several modified forms of ordinary knife-edge bearings and inclined fastening and adjusted devices were also shown. In such modified forms the treadle was represented as designed to oscillate on a rigid bar, in oblong grooves therein; lugs, having knife-edge bearings underneath, being cast on each side of the treadle. Adjustable collars were shown, fastened to the shaft or bar, with inclined lugs on the side of the collars, *projecting laterally over and resting[283] against shoulders on the lugs upon each side of the treadle. The object of the invention was declared to be (italics not in original) "to secure a more substantial table frame to the driving mechanism, and to provide adequate means for the employment of V-shaped treadle bearings, so as to obviate the difficulty heretofore occasioned by lost motion, consisting in vertical and endwise play of the treadle bar or shaft." It was further observed by the applicant just preceding his statement of claims as follows (italics not in original):

"Frequent attempts have been made to use knife-edge bearings for the treadle in sewing machines, but it has been found to be difficult to prevent lateral lost motion and to adjust the parts so as to compensate for their wear and to prevent rattling of the treadle, which has been a serious objection in their employment. My herein-described improvements have overcome all the serious objections hitherto attending their use."

Following the second rejection of his application, Cramer changed his attorneys as mentioned in the statement of facts. In the specification drafted by the new attorneys, and which became the basis of the allowed patent, the asserted invention was limited to its use in sewing machines, eliminating the statement of its adaptability "in other machinery." Concerning the "mufflers," which in the previous specifications were simply referred to as bearing against the end of the treadle bars, or as being on the ends of such bars, the following statement was made (italics not in original):

"Pieces of leather F, or other soft material, cover the top and end of each trunnion to serve as cushions to keep the same close in its bearing, to prevent the noise which would result were the trunnions permitted to bounce, and thump endways, when the treadle is in motion. The leather F is fitted to the curve of the upper side of the trunnion, which is an arc of a cylinder whose center of oscillation is the lower edge of the trunnion; the same leather also interposes between the end of the trunnion and the adjacent iron. f is a block serving as a [284] mere backer to which the cushion F* is attached. This block conforms to the back and top side of the cushion and fills the loop-hole in the brace above the trunnion. It also has tangs or projections e, resting in suitable recesses in the brace C, which are held between the brace and the web of the leg E, by which means the block and cushion are held in place. Below the bearings of the trunnions B, I provide cups, M, attached to the ends of brace C, to catch the oil that usually drips from such bearings."

It is not a strained deduction that the elaborate provision just referred to, respecting the mode of use of, and the purpose to be subserved by, the mufflers, was, in part at least, induced by the statement in the Willcox and Donovan patents above quoted, concerning the difficulties which existed in connection with the use of knife-edge or V-shaped bearings. Be this as it may, however, we are of opinion that the Patent Office, after twice refusing to allow the patent because of the prior patents referred to, was led to take favorable action, owing to the peculiar form of the described bearing, when situated in a vertical cross brace such as was shown in the drawing, with the described accessories, and that it was the purpose of the Patent Office to limit the patent to the particular device of treadle bar and bearing described and shown when employed in combination with a particular form of vertical cross brace. And this view is supported by the claim in question. It contains words of limitation. It is recited therein that the combination is to be "substantially as specified," that is, as described in the specifications and shown in the drawings. Westinghouse v. Boyden Power Brake Co. 170 U. S. 537, 558, 43 L. ed. 1136, 1144, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707. On referring to the specification we find it there expressly declared that the invention consisted "in the construction and combination of parts hereinafter fully described and claimed, reference being had to the accompanying drawing." Nowhere, either expressly or by reasonable inference, is it asserted that simply the best or a preferable construction of the whole or any part of the combination is what is described. On the contrary, starting with the well-known vertical cross brace, a usual accessory to sewing machines,* a spe-[285] cific mode of construction of the treadle bar and of the bearings or supports in the vertical cross brace is set forth, and the specification is concluded with the following declaration (italics mine):

"By this construction my treadle bearings are rigidly fixed and in no way liable to get out of line or to require adjustment; the usual noise is prevented, and overflowing of oil is caught before it can do damage."

To prevent a broadening of the scope of the invention beyond its fair import, in the light of the circumstances surrounding the issuance of the patent, the words of limitation contained in the claim must be given due effect, and, giving them such effect, the statement in the first claim of the elements entering into the combination must be construed to refer to elements in combination having substantially the form and constructed substantially as described in the specification and shown in the drawing.

Having determined the proper construction of the claim of the Cramer patent, which is relied upon, it remains only to consider whether, as correctly construed, infringement resulted from the employment by the Singer company of the device covered by the Diehl patent. We find no difficulty in reaching a conclusion on this branch of the case. The treadle supports devised by Diehl, though they serve the same purpose as the device described and shown in the Cramer patent, are substantially different in construction. Irrespective of the question whether the treadle in the Diehl device is hung in the vertical cross brace proper, or in an addition thereto properly to be regarded as the lower cross rod or cross tie of the machine, it is manifest that the bearing is essentially different in construction from that of Cramer, and is not adapted to receive an oscillating bar; while the treadle is not supplied with long projections fitted to oscillate in the vertical cross bar on bearings therein, but is constructed to turn on point center screws which fit tightly in circular openings in projections from the vertical [286]cross bar. There is *no substantial identity in the character of the two devices, unless, by substantial identity, is meant every combination which produces the same effect. The differences between the Diehl device and the Cramer construction are substantial, and not merely colorable.

The trial court should have granted the motion to direct a verdict for the defendant. In affirming the action of the trial court in overruling the motion, the Circuit Court of Appeals erred, and its judgment must, therefore, be reversed. The judgment of the Circuit Court is also reversed and the cause is remanded to that court with directions to grant a new trial, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Original jurisdiction—suits between states on state bonds—necessary parties defendant.

1. Individual owners of bonds issued by the state of North Carolina, each of which is secured by a separate mortgage of ten shares of railroad stock belonging to that state, are not necessary parties defendant to a suit by the state of South Dakota, as the owner of certain of these bonds, to compel payment and a subjection of the mortgaged property to the satisfaction of the debt.
2. The original jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court, under U. S. Const. art. 3, § 2, over "controversies between two or more states," extends to a suit by the state of South Dakota as the donee of the holders of certain bonds issued by the state of North Carolina, and secured by a mortgage of railroad stock belonging to that state, to compel payment of the bonds and a subjection of the mortgaged property to the satisfaction of the debt.

[No. 8, Original.]

Argued April 13, 14, 15, 1903. Ordered for reargument November 30, 1903. Reargued January 8, 11, 12, 1904. Decided February 1, 1904.

ORIGINAL SUIT by the State of South Dakota against the State of North Carolina, on bonds issued by the latter state, and secured by a mortgage of railroad stock belonging to such state, to compel payment of the bonds and a subjection of the mortgaged property to the satisfaction of the debt. Decree for the amount due on the bonds and coupons in suit; and, in default of such payment, for the sale, at public auction, of the interest of the state of North Carolina in certain railroad stock mortgaged by it as security for the payment of the bonds.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

By an act passed in 1849 (chap. 82, Laws 1848-49), the North Carolina Railroad Company was chartered by the state of North Carolina with a capital of $3,000,000, divided into 30,000 shares of $100 each. The state subscribed for 20,000 shares. The statute authorized the borrowing of money to pay the state subscription, and pledged as security therefor the stock of the railroad company held by the state. In 1855 a further subscription for 10,000 shares was authorized by statute (chap. 32, Laws 1854-55), to be issued on the same terms and with the same security. At the same session an act was passed incorporating the Western North Carolina Railroad Company (chap. 228, Laws 1854-55), which authorized a subscription by the state and the issue of bonds secured by the stock held by the state in said company. On December 19, 1866, a further act was passed (chap. 106, Laws 1866-67), entitled "An Act to Enhance the Value of the Bonds to be Issued for the Completion of the Western North Carolina Railroad, and for Other Purposes," which, after referring to the prior acts of the state authorizing the issue of bonds, and stating that a portion of them had already been issued, added:

"And, whereas, it is manifestly the interest of the people of the whole state that the residue of the bonds, when issued, shall command a high price in market; therefore,

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, *That the public treasurer be, and he [288] is hereby, authorized and directed, whenever it shall become his duty under the provisions of said acts, passed at the sessions of 1854-55 and 1860-61, to issue bonds of the state to the amount of $50,000 or more, to mortgage an equal amount of the stock which the state now holds in the North Carolina Railroad, as collateral security for the payment of said bonds, and to execute and deliver, with each several bond, a deed of mortgage for an equal amount of stock to said North Carolina Railroad, said mortgage to be signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the comptroller, to constitute a part of said bond, and to be transferable in like manner with it, as provided in the charter of said Western North Carolina Railroad Company; and, further, that such mortgages shall have all the force and effect, in law and equity, of registered mortgages without actual registry."

Under this last act bonds were issued in the sum of $1,000 each, having this indorsement:

State of North Carolina, }
Treasury Department. }
Raleigh, July 1, 1867.

Under the provisions of an act of the general assembly of North Carolina, entitled "An Act to Enhance the Value of the Bonds to be Issued for the Completion of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, and for Other Purposes," ratified 19th December, 1866, ten shares of the stock in the North Carolina Railroad Company, originally subscribed for by the state, are hereby mortgaged as collateral security for the payment of this bond.
